THE PREFACE.

HOW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open its selfe to my yonger yeares: and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darke lesse of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation: I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few shall excepted) to confine my discourse, within this our renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are runne out in other travailes; to have set together (as I could) the unioynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the universall: in whome had there bene no other defect, (who am all defect) then the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-peircing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of adversitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading; have caused mee to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the Subject of every opinion wise or weak.

To the world I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Adversity have ever more tied and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs doe alwaies barked at those they know not; and that it is in their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so is it with the inconsiderate multitude. Who, wanting that vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especiall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne, without hearing; and wound, without offence given: led there-vnto by uncertaine report only; Demonolog. l. 3<sup>ca</sup>. which his Maiesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou have inquired the matter: vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Ecclesi. 11. 7

fine iudice, maligna, fallax, Rumor is without witnesse, without iudge, malicious and deceueable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue St. Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, then this of Seneca; Conscientia iustitiamus, nihil in famam laboremus; sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our felues with fame: be it neuer so ill, it is to be despised so we deserue well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prised it before my priuate: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time, than doeb a faire Iunbine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack, and the contrary no other harme than in our agious tempest after the port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further than the defence of Her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what deuice they did it: He that is the Supreme Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt; so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parata, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis in many particulars.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can traualle the world without a passeport. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many interuall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which G.O.D. hath cast, upon Slime and Dust: as that among those that were, of whom we read; and heare, and among those that are, whom we see and conuerse with; euery one hath received a severall picture of face, and euery one a diuers picture of minde; euery one a forme apart, euery one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing where in Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diuersity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall and unnaturall; wise, foolish; manly, and childish affections, and passions in Mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme interuall.

And though it hath pleased G.O.D. to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe; yet, as the fruit tels the name of the Tree; so doe the outward workes of men (so farre as their cogitations are acted) giue vs whereof to guesse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, every neare the life: did not craft in many, feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, reach euery capacity, according to the compasse it hath, to qualifie and make ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam recidunt, quibus veritas non subest. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences, hauing no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometime seene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable creatures, if wee direct our selues to the Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus, The common people are euill Iudges of honest things, and whole wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to bee despised; if to the better sort; euery understanding hath a peculiar indgement; by which it both censures other men, and valueth it selfe. And therefore vnto mee it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthless papers torne with Rats: seeing the slowfull Censurers of all ages, haue not feared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glorie. But of these na-

To me it belongs in the first part of this preface, following the common and approoued custome of those who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens wordes; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath bene honored; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our understanding, since the world it selfe had life and beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumphed ouer time, which besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast & denouing space of so many thousands of yeares, and giuen so faire and peiring eies to our minde; that we plainly behold liuing now, as if we had liued then, that great World, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise worke (saith Hermes) of a great G.O.D. as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it I say it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and againe repopled: How Kings and Kingdomes haue flourish'd and fallen; and for what vertue and piety GOD made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity be made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe unto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-past miseries, with our owne like errors and ill deservings.

But it is neither of Examples the most lively instructions, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified minde; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of GOD doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of GOD doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalities, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathen wisdom confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true GOD. If any (saith Eurypides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euermourning gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaid with his mercies; would require a volume a part: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The markes, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgements vpon the greater and greatest, haue bene left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point farre off, and to speake of the conversion of Angells in a Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the grasse of the earth with beasts, for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when hee slew the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles. Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the Murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloodshed, and cruelty

cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them selues and their issues maisters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no fruit, flower, grasse, nor lease, springing vpon the face of the Earth, of those seedes: No; their very roots and ruines doe hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum eueruntur, vel stando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturn'd by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes and States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and forraigne force, or by inward negligence and dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunk downe vnder their owne weight; of which Liue hath a touch: eo creuit, vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Craetippus obiected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolute.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue vnder-taken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre-off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelities, iniustices, and cruelties; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patternes.

True it is that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vpp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne private; Or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long proesse of time, and won to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath curst in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will bee able to discern the bitter fruites of irreligious policies; as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident proofe, than by assertion, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill successe, I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

The Preface.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft, and crueltie, hee had dispossessed, ouer-reacht, and lastly made blind and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fiftie others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearely beloved.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the Murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times stay and stopping, did againe breake out; and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then suspitious: yet in that hee after wards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whome the Earle as then supposed to beeliuing; (the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeed treason in him-selfe, had his Vncles intelligence beene true) this I say made it manifest, that hee was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged, on the Grand-child of Edward the Thirde: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that Line, that in the second or thirde descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwaies tooke him-selfe for ouer-wise, to bee taught by examples. The Earles of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought them-selues as great politicians in those daies, as others haue done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure them-selues, by the Murder of Gloucester; died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King him-selfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot bee excused, as the disauowing him-selfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons, and Patents) He was in the Prime of his youth deposed; and murdered by his Cousen-germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster; afterwards Henry the fourth.

The Preface.

This King, whose Title was weake, and his obtaining the Crowne treacherous: who brake Faith with the Lordes at his landing, protesting to intend only the recouerie of his proper Inheritance; brake faith with Richard him-selfe; and brake Faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore, that the deposed King should liue. After that he had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies and rebellions: he law (if Soules immortall see and discerne any thinges after the bodies death) his Grand-child Henrie the sixth, and his Sonne the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowne (for which he had caused so much blood to bea powred out) transferred from his race; and by the Issues of his Enemies worne and enioyed; Enemies, whom by his owne practise hee supposed, that he had left no lesse powerlesse, than the succession of the Kingdome questionlesse; by entraining the same vpon his owne Issues, by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no other wise, but that these cautious prouisions of the Father, seconded by the valour and signall victories of his Sonne Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despair of al reconquest and recouery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Calaubon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundata; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henrie the sixth, vpon whom the great storme of his Grand-fathers greivous faults fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince; yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom hee was affianced (by which match hee might haue defended his Inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so as in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong pillar of the house of Lancaster; Hee drew on him-selfe and this kingdome the greatest ioynt-losse & dishonor, that euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his owne spake of Henrie the Thirde of France, Qu'il estoit vns fort gentil Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vne fort mauuois temps, That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reign happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolke, because the Duke gaue instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute; the Queene, in respect of her personall wound, interpretæque iniuria forma, forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as hee dared to dispute his right, both by arguments and armes; in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolued. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke: yet his sonne the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward, the sonne, both of their liues and Kingdomes: And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That shee liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, and her onely sonne the Prince, were hewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee liued to see her selfe despoiled of her Estate, and of her moueables; and lastly, her Father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Earldome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of Fifty thousand crownes for her ransom, to become a starke beggar. And this was the end of that subtiltie, which Siracides calleth fine, but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yeelded since the world was.

The Preface.

And now comes it to Edward the fourth turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaster were rooted up; One onely Earle of Richmond excepted: whome also hee had once bought of the Duke of Britaine, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a plantation; as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings; and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragical Actors, there was not one that escaped the iudgement of GOD in the same kinde. And He, which besides the execution of his brother of Clarence, for none other offence then hee himselfe had formed in his owne imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his predecessour; taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sonnes and Successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings, which haue sold the blood of others at a low rate; haue but made the Market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischeifs of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedie, hee had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet hee so well fitted every affection that played with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred: as hee easily

easily allured them to condescend, that Riuer and Grey, the Kings Mother and half brother, should (for the first) be seuered from him: secondly, hee wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned, and lastly (for the avoyding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads seuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery poss, namely, To depresse those whome they had grieued, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; Hee urged that argument so farre and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the yong king himselfe, and of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For hee caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the king or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power; they would take a most seuerer reuenge of that curelesse wrong, offered to their vncle and brother, Riuer and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer trades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so hee did. But when hee found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not fordable; He first resolved to kill him sitting in counsell: wherein hauing sayled with his sword; He set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite; He caused his head to be stricken off, before he ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of GOD, than this upon Hastings, I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same due that the Earle Riuer, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings himselfe in the same daie, and (as I take it) in the same house, in the same lawlesse manner had his head stricken off in the Tower of London; But Buckingham liued a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And hauing receiued the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of minde, and unfortunate attempts being in the end betrayed and deliuered up by his trustiest seruants; He had his head seuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what success he had Richard himselfe after all these mischeifs and Murders policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion; and after such time, as with a most mercilesse hand hee had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke ouer and discern in the great outcrie of innocent blood, obtaining at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King Henry the seauenth cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of GODS iustice. A politique Prince hee was if euer there were any, and who by the ingine of his wisdom, beat downe and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after hee were the crowne as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he euer left the raines of his affections in the hands of his profite, so he alwaies wayed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. Hee had well obserued the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whome hee followed in all that was royall or royal-like, but hee was farre more iust, and began not their processs whome hee hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

Hee could neuer indure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, and therein exceeding wise, for what so euer him-selfe gaue, hee him-selfe receiued backe the thanks and the loue, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so reddeley as by benefitts) were traynes that better became great Kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in what so euer hee greened his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How so euer, the taking off, of Stanles head, who set the Crowne on his, and the death of the young Earle of Warwick, some to George D. of Clarence, others, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his ancestors, for his possession in the first line ended in his grand children, as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and Patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did hee aduance in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue hee abundant flowres from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the Hine? How many wiues did hee cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whome our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did he execute? Yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to haue giuen his accompt to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father, and executed the Earle of Surrey the sonne; the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, hauing neuer omitted any thing that concerned his owne honour, and the Kings seruice; the other, neuer hauing committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised; the other, no lesse valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which hee heaped vpon the Fatherlesse, and widowes at home: and besides the ruaine enterprises abroad, wherein it was thought that hee consumed more Treasure, than all our victorious Kings

The Preface.

Kings did in their seuerall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did he make vpon his owne Nephew King Iames the first? What Lawes and Wills did he deuise, to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? vsing his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that him-selfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased GOD to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselves in their seuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these wordes of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, haue bene verified vpon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse: so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, GOD hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiesty now liuing, and long to liue, is descended. Of whome I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discern in His life, euen to this daie, any one of those foule spots, by which the Consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stayned both their hands and faces. And for this Crowne of England; it may truly be a-crowed, That hee hath receiued it euen from the hand of GOD, and hath stayed the time of putting it on, howsoeuer hee were prouoked to hasten it: That Hee neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that fought to put him beside it: That Hee refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Princeesse did, That His Maiesty entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was receiued. And howsoeuer His Maiesties preceding title to this Kingdome, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet hee neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady, his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long reigne.

Neither ought wee to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northerne parts of Brittain to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were seuered but by small brookes and haucks, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely seuered. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiesty hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty grieuances together, and heap them vp to their height, they will appeare but as a Mole-hill, compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historiours since then; haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest happinesse, (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome receiued from GOD, certainly the peace betwene the two Lions of gold and giues, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our britis bloud, heretofore and during the difference so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more enabled to recover her ancient honor and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies and conquests: It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the year 1588, ioyned the army which hee commanded with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; and had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is easie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue bought this union at a farre greater price than it hath since cost vs.

It is true, that there was neuer any Common-weale or Kingdome in the world; wherein man had cause to lament. Kings liue in the world and not aboue it. They are not infinite to examine euery mans cause, or to relieue euery mans woe. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne prejudice) His Maiesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his owne Coffers. Of whome it may be said, as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: Which if other men doe not vnderstand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it bee better spoken of His Maiesty, than of any King that euer England had; who as well in Diuine, as Human vnderstanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption; and withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters; which by her owne Commandement, were knockt in peeces and cast into the fire. For ill Artifts, in setting out the beauty of the external: and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internal; doe often leaue to posterity, of well-formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely mindes, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needes no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbowr-Princes (of whome for that purpose I haue inserted this breife discourse) with His Maiesties temperate, reuengelesse, and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an even hand: and withall, but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man which hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King him-selfe hath.

Now

The Preface.

Now as we haue told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is euery where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation, and vnnaturall cruelty of Henry the first, and of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt He with the sonnes of Loys Debonaire, the sonne of Charles the great, or Charlemain. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the sonne of Pepin, the eldest sonne of Charlemain, and heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his elder brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poysonings, imprisonments, and ciuill warre; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished.

And though Debonaire, after hee had rid himselfe of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his Bastard Brothers by a ciuill death (hauing inclosed them with sure gard, all the daies of their liues, within a Monasterie) beid him-selfe secure from all opposition: Yet GOD raised vp against him (which hee suspected not) his owne sonnes, to reuenge him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his owne sonnes, with whome (to satisfie their ambition) hee had shared his estate, and given them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Tea his eldest sonne Lothaire (for hee had four, three by his first wife, and one by his second, to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, That hee had vsed violence towards his Brothers and Kinsmen, and that hee had suffered his Nephew (whome hee might haue deliuered) to be slaine, eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permiserit. Because hee vsed violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffred his Nephew to be slaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Yet did hee that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which hee performed in the Generall Assemblie of the States it followes, Post hæc autem palam se crasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosij exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this hee did openly confesse him-selfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius hee vnder-went voluntary penance as, well for his other offences, as for that which hee had done against Bernard his owne Nephew.

This hee did: and it was praise-worthie. But the bloud that is vniustly spilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

Taff. Wisdom

This King, as I have said, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdom of Italy; as Charlemain, his Father, had done to Pepin the Father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second sonne he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdom of Bauier: and to Charles, whome hee had by a second wife, called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his sonne Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles: which, after the death of his sonne Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his Grandchild bearing the same name. In the meane while, being invaded by his sonne Loys of Bauier, he dies for greife.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles after wards called the bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioyned in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the most bloody battaile that euer was stroken in France: in which, the marvellous losse of Nobility, and men of warre, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italie; to the Hunnes, to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes, to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster, Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eyes of his sonne Carloman; Bauire invades the Emperour Lothaire his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is assailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience, for his rebellion against his Father and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monestarie. Charles the Bald the Uncle oppresseth his Nephewes the sonnes of Lothaire, hee usurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loys of Bauiere his elder Brother, Bauiers armies and his sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of greife, and the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Iew his Physitian, his sonne Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke. Beque had Charles the simple, and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breaks his Neck; the younger is slaine by a wild Bore; the sonne of Bauiere had the same ill destiny and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie, wherewith not contented, hee invades Charles the simple, but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderstanding, hee dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Peron. Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breaks his Neck in Chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poison, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whome Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes him-selfe King.

Thefe

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after hee had once apparelled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successeurs tooke up the fashion; and wore that Garment so long without other prouision, as when the same was torne from their shouldders, every man despised them as miserable and naked beggers. The wretched successe they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, qu'en ceste mortil y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iustice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit of Bernard the sonne of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling, than either GOD, or Iustice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fault) that euer the French-men had, did neuer enjoy him-selfe; after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were there-upon burnt, and murdered; men, woemen, and children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented him-selfe of the fault, and gave charge to Henry his sonne, to doe iustice upon the Murderers; threatening his sonne with GODS judgments, if hee neglected it. But this unreasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him-selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomerie; we all may remember what became of his foure sonnes, Francis Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres, upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood; the Crowne was set on his head, whome they all laboured to disolue; the Protestants remaine more in number than euer they were; and hold to this day more strong citities than euer they had.

Let us now see if GOD be not the same GOD in Spaine, as in England and France. Towards whome we wil looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowich of Moscouia, were but pettie ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, hauing bene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which hee caused to be slaine in his owne Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Maister of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whome he cutt in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great commander of Castile, Hee made away the two Infantes of Arragon his Cosen-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred, and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after hee had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had liued sixteen years, and the other fourteen; hee murdered them there. Nay hee spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly as he caused the Arch-bishop of Toledo, and the Deane, to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbarie, with seauen and thirty of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of mony, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea he would needs assist the Hangman with his waile hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemy both to GOD and Man. But what was his end? Having bene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Agramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer bene in danger of any such thing.

If wee can parallell any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne: who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and renowned Church-men, the Earle of gran Pré Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accomptes, Treasure, and Request, (with sixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while hee hoped to gouerne, and to haue maistred France: Hee was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten there vnto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre; and, contrarie to faith, and the promise that hee made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted therest, as there was no meanes left for any army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings

King of Spaine

Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied vnto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonsaluo, cast them out; and shewed their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heauen and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with child, with her vniuely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his neck in her presence; and being with child by her second, died with it. A iust iudgement of GOD vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine, with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned foole; and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eighth, hee cast off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood; lost Callice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maisters of a new name; and, by a strange familie are gouerned and possessed.

Charles the sixth, sonne to the Arch-duke Philip, in whose vaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almans, and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines, were consumed: who gaue the while a most perilous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendome, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire; stole away from Insprug; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions, wherein hee concocted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in either: hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip; from whom he very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His Sonne againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeland (wrested by his Ancestors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princess) and to possess in peace manie other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischeiuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperor by the Nobility of those countries; nor only forgot the present, made him upon his entrie, of forty millions of Florents, called the Nouale aide; nor only forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworne to the Generall states, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Prouinces: but beginning first to constraîne them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intolerable Impositions; He lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make him-selfe not only an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France; but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feete all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a dispensation of his former Oathes (which dispensation was the true cause of all the warre and bloodshed since then) and after he had tried what hee could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobility, vnder the government of his base sister Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinall Granuile; Hee employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughterd that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaucare; and Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, and the Marquis of Berghes; and cut off in those fixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen and others, eightene thousand and fixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders and massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished endes, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: Hee sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But hee, vsing the same papall aduantage that his predecessors had done: made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the generall states; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other strangers, there in garrison. Towards whose Pay and Passport, the Netherlands strained them-selues to make payment of fixe hundred thousand pounds. Which monies receiued, He suddenly surpris'd the Citadells of Antwerp and Nemeures: not doubting (being vn suspected by the States) to haue possess'd him-selfe of all the maiestie places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer hee ouertly pretended: Hee held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretarie Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practis'd, and now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect and end of this peruerie, and of all other the Dukes cruelties. First for him-selfe; after hee had murdered so many of the Nobility; executed (as aforesaid) eightene thousand fixe hundred in fixe yeares; and most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Child, in Mecklin, Zurphen, Naerden, and other places: and after hee had consumed fixe and thirtie millions of treasure in fixe yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish want, That hee would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arriuall. For Don Iohn, whose hangbry conceit of him selfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to manage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers ieaousie and distrust; with the continuely death that seized him, euen in the flowre of his youth. And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Master both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arriuall, and before any access to the King, by certaine Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if wee consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, and successe in this businesse; there is nothing left to the memorie of man more remarkable. For hee hath paid aboue an hundred Millions, and the liues of aboue foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; and for reuennue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a Nation, which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despite of all his forces become free Estates, and farre more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first began to impouerish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and vnder what reasons of State, and politique subtilties, haue these forrenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon them selves, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and scene an effect so directly contrarie to all their owne counsailes and cruelties; as the one could neuer haue hoped for them-selves; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. GOD hath said it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the lining, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer, or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for.

For

The Preface.

For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or preiudice our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so wee neither looke behind vs what hath beene, nor before vs what shall bee. It is true, that the quantitie which wee haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and wee inhabit it. The Heauens are high, far off and vnsearceable: wee haue sense and feeling of corporal things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthlie: and it is lesse to bee wondred at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Elai cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleeued our reports? And out of doubt, as Elai complained then for him selfe and others: so are they lesse beleeued, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, bee in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idolls of vanitie: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? Wee professe that wee know GOD: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitudo doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Deuills know them better than men. Beatitudo non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to bee admired, and more to bee lamented, than the priuat contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetual warre, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well nere driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolue, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiall habitation: when on the contrary, besides the discourse of outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. Wee are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voice, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues we renounce our Persons, and the parts wee play. For Charitie, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word; but the same which is altogether exercised in the seruice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it.

Thefe

The Preface.

These indeed bee the markes, which (when wee haue bent our consciences to the highest) wee all shooote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, wee our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For therest; Hee that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the use: When goods increafe (saith Salomon) they also increafe that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leauing vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Darnet, and use his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the first, after the resignation of his Estares, stayed at Vlushing for winde, to carrie him his last iourne into Spaine; Hee conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embatladour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no bodie answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some goneto their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle him-selfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when Hee was come to the staires foot, He said thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when hee shalbe dead and gone, That Him, whome thou hast knowne in thy time enuioured with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiours, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domestically seruants. &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no means goe about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please them-selues with the noyle they make. For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer beene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer beene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune her-selfe rides the Man. Who, when hee is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and

Fortune

The Preface.

Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt pursues at the other, which equall libertie.

The second, is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whome wee leave behind vs. Certainly, of those which conceive that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shalbe once separate from our mortall bodies, and disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their pouertie, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vpon a Beggars cottage.

Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui etiam eorum filij quia anima mortuorum rebus viuientium non interfunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuertant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustine, wee cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shalbe honorable: neither shall wee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shalbe of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confermeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieth him-himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (saith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all. for who can shew vnto man, what shalbe after him vnder the Sunne? Hee therefore accepted it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and traualle in the world; not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof: which made mee (saith hee) endeavour euen to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death GOD hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope; seeing the Prophet Esai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Ibraell knowes vs not. But hercof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death:

(of whose following day wee shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when wee shall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy, nor any returne of foregone and mortall affection, towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whome whether wee shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a diuine life retain any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; wee shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory

of their felicities which remaine in the World. No; bee their estates greater than euer the World gaue, wee shall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euen detest their consideration. And whatsoeuer comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charitie, which wee exercised liuing: and in that Pietie, Iustice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of GOD to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall wee therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnecessarie and vaine? certainlie no. For that infinite wisdom of GOD, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees: which hath giuen greater and lesse light, and beautie, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the stie, the Cedar and the Shrub: and among stones, giuen the fairest tincture to the Rubie, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posteritie, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggerie: and that riches, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pittie; I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods bee well gotten, and that wee raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodilie health; secondly, the forme and beautie; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quasitas: so Hieremie cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equitie: and Esai the same, Woeto those that spoyle and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Salomon, that hee commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood; and not to swallow them vp aliuie whose riches wee couet: for such are the wages (saith hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if wee could afford our selues but so much leisuere as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yee no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past when wee were not, or by that time which is to come in which wee shall abide for euer: I say, if both, to wit our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that wee so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdom, as hee pleaseth. Let the rich-

The Preface.

Rich men thinke all fooles, that cannot equal his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not troden downe their opposites; the Politician, all grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when wee once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive vs; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Nauigation of this life takes end: Then it is I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad and seuerer cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that wee cry out to GOD for mercie; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty towards others: and it is onely then, that wee are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That GOD will not be mockt. For if according to Saint Peter, The righteous scarcely bee saved: and that GOD spared not his Angells: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuerer commandments of the All-powerfull GOD were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which wee draw when death presseth vs, if wee can but feign it to be the sound of Mercy (without any kinde of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a renowned Father, Cum hac spe ad eternos labores & bella descendunt: I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that wee ended well: for wee all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall wee call a disesteeming, an apposing, or (indeed) a mocking of GOD; if those men doe not appose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for GOD, to aske him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they other-wise, that die this kinde of well-dying, but say vnto GOD as followeth? Wee beseech thee O GOD, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust GOD; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall pra- iudice my sonne (which I am reioyned not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene iunior (which I am too proud to doe) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new GOD; or haue made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth wore in his Cappe; which, when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, hee would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last, which, (as at other times) hee did, when by the practise of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be reijed towards a Leaden, but not towards the eu-er-living GOD. But of this composition are all the deuout louers of the world, that they feare all that is durelesse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practises of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beat but vpon shadows: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous, bee they friends or Kings: yea they durt vnder water, like Ducks, at euery pebble stone, that is but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour, against the terrible iudgements of the All-powerfull GOD: yea they shew themselves gods against GOD, and slaues towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If wee truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit of the rich and mighty, whome wee call fortunate; and of the poore and oppressed, whome we account wretched: wee shall finde the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by GOD to the very instant, and both so subiect to interchange (witnesseth the suddaine downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy vprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vn-certaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be deprived of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vehat, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vn certaine. And yet wee cannot tell (saith Saint Iames) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set vp, and to morrow hee shall not be found: for hee is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersitie, be very obscure: yet therein wee better discern GOD, than in that shining light which enuironeth worldly glorie; through which, for the clearenesse thereof, there is no vanitie, which escapeh our sight. And let aduersitie seeme what it will; to happie men, ridiculous, who make themselves merrie at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the troile, greivous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For bee it that wee haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all wee haue reioyced; or bee it that wee haue measured the same length of daies, and therein haue eu-er more sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, we find both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the wee, say-led out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs and hold vs in chace, from our infancie, hath gathered it. Quicquid erat is retro est, mors tenet: What-so-euer of our age is past, death holds it. So as who-soeuer bee hee, to whome Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompts of his memory (for wee haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truely examine what it hath reserved either of beauty and youth, or foregone delights; what it hath saved, that that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of what euer else the amorous Spring-time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnauailable; and bee shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heauie, secret, and sad sighes. Hee shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow up after our fast-springing youth; ouer-take it, when it is at a stand, and ouer-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, and from our now being; the poore, diseased, and captiue creature, hath as little sence of all his former miseries and paines; as hee, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures and delights. For what-so-euer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it. Omnia quæ euentura sunt, incerto iacent. Onely those few black Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memorie of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glorie.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first wee complaine to GOD against our felues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Etrius iustus in omnibus quæ uenerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if hee had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs, hauing had them; forgetting that humble and iust acknowledgment of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt hee is either a fool or congratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane so-euer his estate bee, that the same is yet farre greater, than that which GOD oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe so-euer his afflictions bee, that the same are yet farre lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa uiuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, and beare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them man-like, and resolutely; not as those whining souldiours doe, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, and appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, beene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger; a begger begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Gran Signior of the Turkes in the morning, and in the same day the Foot-stoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also playd, being taken by Sapore) that made Belliliarius play the most victorious Capitaine, and lastly the part of a blinde beggar; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but of the last worlde, complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, euery man weares but his owne skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weaknes, prise the passages of this world other wise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenij est reuocare mentem a terribilibus) it is by reason of that unhappie fantasye of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporal excepted) whereunto hee is subiect: Therein it is, that Misfortune and Aduersitie worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, what euer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnes in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinkes but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortuna succumbere, quod tritius est omni tato, to fall vnder fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

The Preface.

But it is now time to sound a retreat; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued me, to draw the picture of time past (which we call Historie) in so large a table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine providence, euery where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so nare, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Providence; (for what Father forsaeth the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation) Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation & Providence, but granting that the world had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time, for by Faith we vnderstand, that the world was made by the word of God; he too mighty a work for Aristotles rotten ground to beare up, vpon which he hath notwithstanding founded the Defences of Forreifes of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessitie of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Nature all reason, wherein hee beleecued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvaile at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath sayled in this maine poynt; and taught liete other than termes in the rest.) haue so retrencht their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected them-selues to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heauen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipse dixit, doth make them to bee such? certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built anything so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in euery question of Nature, and finite power, may bee approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his Booke of wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a auant d'authorité que l'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Euery humane proposition hath equall authoritie, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the vpright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vilo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any iudgment approve the iuention of those that fore-went them; and suffer them-selues, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which slouth and dullnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophie, Physick, and Diuinity, in a Pillory; and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Virtus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer bee perswaded, that GOD hath but ryp all light of Learning within the lamborne of Aristotles braines; or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Cordetuo Lucernam intellectus: that GOD hath giuen inuention but to the Heathers; and that they onely haue inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these bee the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sower Runnet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowernesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to bee found in vulgar Philosophie, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man, to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue an true reason for the Grasse vnder his feete, why it should bee greener rather then red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than him-selfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heauens them-selues: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world; as hee no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding nothing true; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle bee hee) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action and effect, telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as hee) but not what it is, which neither hee, nor any else, doth know; but GOD that created it; (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all the actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee knowe him not; and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before. Man-kind had a beginning of being. Hee will disable GODS power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the mothes of the Aire for a cause; cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Esernall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make him-selfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectaours haue maintained it; paratiac coniurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after, Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melilius, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleantes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessitie of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnā esse consentiant: siue enim Natura, siue Aether, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex, idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Lactantius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the same bee Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance; that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Riuers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some times hide them-selues for a while vnder ground, and seeme to be lost in Sea-like

The Preface.

Lakes; doe not last finde, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacitie hath, and after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiositie; in the necessitie of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolves it selfe.

As for others, and first touching those, which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternall, and that God did not create the world ex nihilo, but ex materia preexistente: the Supposition is so weake, as it hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videtur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexet, They seeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, and part to Fortune: in so much as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did sit it selfe to God; or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himselfe, according to the proportion of Matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter had been made by any Power, nor Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no lesse, than serued to receiue the forme of the vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as serued to finish the worke of the World: Or had there bene more of this matter, than sufficed; then did God dissolve & annihilate what-soeuer remained and was superfluous. And this must euery reasonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing. And by the same are and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, bee againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other, were the greatest idiotisme. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time, of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither produce it selfe, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum precedit, nec seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth precede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saie this matter to be eternall, must of necessitie confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternitie. And then had infinite nite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conclusion of this part; who-so-euer will make choyce, rather to beleue in eternall deformitie, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth reames to expresse it. For what reason of man (whome the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which wee can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it selfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if it had bene GODS will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation; the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Tea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in vna existentia omnia prahabet: and againe Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod videt, & quod non videt; to wit, causaliter, or in better reames, non tamquam forma, fed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed vpon all of GOD. For the most parts of his workes (saith Stracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened, by the glorious work of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldome entitle GOD the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the all-mighty, that is infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternitie; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) bee taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, imposed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctour Aristotle him selfe confesseth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsum infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to bee infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, fed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia completi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falsehood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if wee compare the world vniuersall, and all the vnmeasurable Orbes of Heauen; and those merueilous bodies of the Sunne, Moone, and Statres, with ipsum infinitum: it may truly bee said of them all, which him selfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore fore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in GODS power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the world vniuersall, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcel of that which is the vniuersalitie and the infinitie it selfe; and Plato, but a shadow of GOD. But the other, to proue the worlds eternitie, vtgeth this Maxime, That A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring, that GOD being for euer a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer; to wit, the world vniuersall. But what a strang mockerie is this in so great a Maister, to confesse a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, (to wit an almighty GOD) in his Antecedent; and the same GOD to be a GOD restrained in his conclusion, to make GOD free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choyce of the time when? For this were impiously to resolue of GOD, as of naturall necessity; which hath neither choyce, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but work matter being present; as fire, to burne things combustible.

Againe he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can worke, and doth not worke: if it after-ward worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by some-what else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But GOD (saith he) is immouable, and is neither moued by him selfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwaies worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by GOD, that he was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that GODS performing in due time that, which hee euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancie in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be said to be eternall: which the Platonick s call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idea, and Creation in time. Spirituale ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vira equali est Architecto; fuit semper cum illo, eritque sumper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decessit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the famplier of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architec for it was for euer with him, and euer shalbe. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come.

The

The Preface.

The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other-wise, than that after the consummation of this World, there shalbe a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions bee not unworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, and knis to the Diuine Being, by an individuall and inseperable power, flowing from diuine vnitie; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of GOD sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a goodness and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knis together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith hee) is not capable of, but receiueh it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successiue every moment by little and little; euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, doe by the same small degrees succeed; as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, will denie that euer it shall haue any end, and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer scene, no nor by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the Elder by continuance; or in any sort other-wise than they were; which had they bene subiect to finall corruption, some change would haue bene discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may recieue answer by coniectures: it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossly mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Summes heat; neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, navigable. But wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which wee Navigate, passable enough. Wee read also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Summes violent heat.

The Preface.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-walls, of matter molding and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vpp out of the earth, of that depth, as suppos'd to haue bene buried by the generall flood: without any alteration either of substance or figure, yea it is beleiu'd, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementarie, and compounded, the eldest times haue not inuaded and corrupted: what great alteration should wee looke for in Caelestiall and quintessentiaall bodies? And yet wee haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as here-to-fore. We haue neither Giants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, wee might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can bee made to this obiection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene a-like eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equal: why not equal conditions to all? why should heavenly bodies liue for ever; and the bodies of Men rotte and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gaue Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betwene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those boundes, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every yeare: the Moone to liue by borrowed light: the first starres (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, giuen light vnto, and releiu'd all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternitie: He may iustly be called eternall charity, and euerslasting Loue. The same may be saide of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines

of vertue and operation, may also bee called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleine againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Hesiodus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad follie, wee see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason deserue it better; That the Sunne, Moone, Starres, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue nor constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quae illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best definition bee taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Caelo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but vnnimall, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion, from Artificiall: which yet the Academics open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Prouidence; the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But bee it what bee will, or bee it any of these (GOD excepted) for participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is vnnamorable of Lactantius: Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; Hec onely can bee said to bee the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublatâ vero mediorum materialiumque diuersitate, vel vnicum vel similitum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choyce of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heaven and Earth; it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finis; and power to gouerne: without which, all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heaven, or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius, quā Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesq; lumnum locum diuino cuidam numini allignant. And this I say in short: that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est assensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature. be it but in termes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will; and makerh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all, It is God that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the earth, that beauties things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery River into the salt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and knowledge it is that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things work as they do, (call it by toym, by Nature, or by what you please) yet because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder. To to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, & such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall, (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith; and Reason, without the force of Authoritie) all things doe as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters of arming River doe successively pursue each other from the first fountaines.

This

The Preface.

This much I say it is, that Reason it selfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapientia Plato calleth, absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good; and another, scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith M. More) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to inquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world. Or of his secret iudgment, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insaniunt, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it. For as it is no shame nor dishonor (saith a French Author) de taire arrest au but qu'on n'ait eue surpasser, For a man to rest himselfe there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so what soeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, It acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it selfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason and Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is pars diuini spiritus in corpus humanū meris) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe hereof is not weakened, but greatly strenghtned, by our ignorance; because it is the same Reason that tels vs, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conuected by man.

I haue bene already ouer long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the vnswearable diuision of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the deuising euery of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it suites well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake to much, and yet say little; Ipsi nobis furto subducimur, We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleene as he doth; that who so thinkes himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of w. n., against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, doe alwaies keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves, from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally

The Preface

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vpp the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe, from the very cradle and beginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures wee are referred) are now where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot vpp here and there in the same time. I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil.

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;
They appear here and there floating in the great gulfes of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobilitie, Politie in warre; Navigation; and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speake therefore of these (seeing in a generall Historie we should haue left a great deale of Nakednesse, by their omission) it cannot properly bee called a digression. True it is that I haue also made many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing wee digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better bee excused, in writing their liues and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of Historie, vnd of the Kindes.

The same hath bene taught by many; but by no man better, and with greater breuity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preache vnto vs. But wee still make large digressions: yea the teachers themselves do not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest; after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchie, producing Actions of more importance than were else where to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of

Rome

The Preface.

Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their severall beginnings, in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies; which in the end swallowed them vpp. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers: who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and runne in a maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weake; and the stile not euery where like it selfe: the first, shewes their legitimation and true Parent; the second, will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgill, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili aeuena, vsed stronger pipes when he sounded the warres of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I vse diuers Hebrew words in my first booke; and else where: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I finde in Montanus; others in Lattaine Carester in S. Senensis, and of the rest I haue borrowed the interpretation of some of my learned friends. But say I had bene beholding to neither, yet were it not to bee wondered at hauing had a eleuen yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other; tongue, how-so-euer, I know that it will bee said by many, That I might haue bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times; hauing bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that who-so-euer in writing a moderne Historie, shall follow truth too neare the beeles, it may happily strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and seruants into greater miseries. Her that goes after her too farre off, loseth her sight, and loseth him selfe: and hee that walkes after her at a middle distance, I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Basenesse. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vse of them: and I haue now too few daies remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardise, or both, doe yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, betwene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet liuing, in their persons that are long since dead; and haue it laid to my charge. But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall finde fault with me for painting them over a new; they shall therein accuse themselves iustly, and me falsely.

The Preface.

For I protest before the Maiesty of GOD, That I malice no man under the Sunne. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subiection to their private passions; but that they seeme diuerse persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so doe I: Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis fed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successiue hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vnderooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which all that is presented, hath receiued both blows & thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersitie hath disarmed mee. I am on the ground already; and therefore haue not farre to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation their is no recession to habit; so is it seldome seene in the priuation politique. I doe therefore for-beare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intended) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall we euer more be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion; all the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Lowe towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall doe againe. For had it beene otherwise, I should hardly haue had this leisure, to haue made my selfe a foole in print.

CHAPTER. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

¶ I. That the invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

¶ II. That the wisest of the Heavens, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue beene created by God.

¶ IIII. Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth.] Gen. i. 1.

¶ V. That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the bodie of the Earth, is by Moses vnderstood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Vnformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heauen.

¶ VI. How it is to be vnderstood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

¶ VII. Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and diffinitie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

¶ VIII. Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there bee any crystalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

¶ IX. A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

¶ IX. That Nature is no Principium per se, nor Forme, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

¶ XI. Of Fate; and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operations may duly be prevented or furthered.

¶ XII. Of Praescience.

¶ XIII. Of Providence.

¶ XIII. Of Praedestination.

¶ XV. Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first creation: and of Gods rest.

OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. I.
Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

§. III.
Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortal Soule.

§. IIII.
Of the Spirit of life which God breathed into Man in his creation.

§. V.
That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitye.

§. VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first creation to dispose of himself.

§. VII.
Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Ruines all created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no meruaile that men should erre.

§. II.
A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.
That there was a true locall Paradise, Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

§. IIII.
Why it should bee needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused hills in the Earth.

§. VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Rivers.

§. VII.
Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher then the middle Region of the aire.

§. VIII.
Of their opinion that seat Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coele Syria, there is a Countrie in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X.
Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.
Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one stream.

§. XII.
Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

§. XIII.
Of the River Pison, and the Land of Hauran.

§. XIIIII.
Of the River Gehon, & the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush. 2. Chron. 21. 16.

§. XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP.

of the first Booke.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.
That the Tree of Life was a materiall Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

§. II.
Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.
Of Becanus his not unwittie allegorizing of the storie of his Ficus Indica.

§. IIII.
Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euil: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betwene the fall of Adam, and the flood of Noah.

§. I.
Of the cause, and the reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

§. II.
Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

§. III.
Of Moses his omitting sundrie things concerning Cains generation.

§. IIII.
Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

§. V.
Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and of some of late memorie.

§. VI.
Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the flood.

§. VII.
Of the men of renouue before the flood.

§. VIII.
That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.
That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.
That the corruption it selfe was very ancient: as in the Familie of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III.
That in proceffe of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IIII.
That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idolls and Fables were invented: and that the first Iupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.
Of the three chiefe Iupiters; and the strange storie of the third.

§. VI.

ϕ. IX.
That the Arke was of sufficient capacitee.

ϕ. X.
That the Arke rested upon part of the Hill
Taurus (or Caucausus) betweene the East Indies and Scythia.

ϕ. I.
A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of nations.

ϕ. II.
A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

†. III.
The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so neare a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.
The second Argument; That the Eastern people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glorie.

†. V.
The third Argument; From the wonder-full resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

†. VI.
The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.
Of the sciscisse opinion of Annius the Commenter upon Berolus, that the Arke rested upon Montes Caspij in Armenia; and yet upon Gordiz, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.
The first Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neare the place where the Arke rested.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text. The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

†. X.
An answer to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.
Of Caucausus, and diuers farre higher Hills than the Armenian.

†. XII.
Of diuers incongruities, if in this storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

of the first Booke.

†. XIII.
Of the contrarie situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no meruall, that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all a long, and euen in India, bee called Ararat.

†. XIIIII.
Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South-side of the mountains; Caucaus, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

†. XV.
The conclusion, with a briebe repesting of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the flood: and of the Sonnnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was repeopled.

ϕ. I.
VHether Shem and Ham were elder then Iaphet.

ϕ. II.
Of diuers things that in after ages are to be prepared, touching the first planting of the world, as that all Historicks must yeld to Moses: that the world was not plaxted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages, were of the issue of Ham.

ϕ. III.
Of the issue of the Gentills in Iaphets portion: of Berolus his too speedie seating Go-mer the Sonne of Iaphet in Italie, and another of Iaphets Sonnnes Tubal in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of longinque Nauigation.

ϕ. IIII.
Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Melch, seated first about Asia the lesse; out of Izechiel, cap. 38-39.

ϕ. V.
Against the fabulen; Berolus his fiction,
That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

ϕ. VI.
That Gomer also and his Sonne Togorma, of the posteritie of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe; and Northward into Sarmatia.

ϕ. VII.
Of Iauan the fourth Sonne of Iaphet, and of Melch, of Aram, & Melch of Iaphet.

ϕ. VIII.
Of Alcanaz and Riphath, the two elder Sonnnes of Gomer.

ϕ. IX.
Of the foure Sonnnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharjis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

ϕ. X.
That the seat of Chush, the eldest Sonne of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.
OF Iosephus his tale of an Æthiopesse wife to Moses, grounded on the mista-king of the seat of Chush.

†. II.
A dispute against the tale of Iosephus.

†. III.
Chushill expounded for Æthiopia, Ezech. 29.10.

†. IIII.
Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. v. 9.
in like manner misfaken.

†. V.
A place Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Æthiopia.

†. VI.
That upon place of the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the storie of Senacherib, and Zera in the storie of Asa, are vniadvisedly made Æthiopiens.

†. VII.
A farther exposition of the place.
Esay 18. 1.

ϕ. XI.
Of the plantation and Antiquities of Æ-gypt.

The Contents

†. I.
That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

†. II.
Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeares, which made their antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

†. III.
Of certaine vaine assertions of the antiquities of the Egyptians.

†. IIII.
Against Pererius; That it is not unlike-ly, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeares after the Creation; at least that both it, and the most parts of the World, were peopled before the Flood.

†. V.
Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.
Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. vlt. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

†. VII.
A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another sonne of Ham, which peopled Libya.

†. VIII.
Of the eleven sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.
Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven sonnes.

†. II.
Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

†. III.
Of the Iebusites, and Amorites.

†. IIII.
Of the Gergelites, Heuites, & Harkites.

†. V.
Of Sini and Aruadi.

†. VI.
Of Zemari.

†. VII.
Of Hamathi.

†. XIII.
Of the sonnes of Chulsh, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.
That the most of the sons of Chulsh were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

†. II.
Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chulsh, to haue bene seated in the West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

†. IIII.
Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, cap. 9. v. 7.

†. XV.
Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his sonnes.

†. III.
Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

†. IIII.
Of the sonnes of Iofthan, the other sonne of Heber.

†. V.
Of Ophir, one of Iofthans sonnes, and of Peru: and of that voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.
Of Hauilah the sonne of Iofthan, who also ressed into the East Indies: and of Melha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the families of Iofthan: with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

†. I.
Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of Families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

†. II.
Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

†. III.

of the first Booke.

†. III.
Of the good Government of the first Kings.

†. IIII.
Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

†. I.
That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Soueraigne Lords: and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of insti authority.

†. II.
That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

†. III.
That Nimrod, not Assur, built Niniae: and that it is probable out of Esai 23. 13. that Assur built Vr of the Chaldees.

†. IIII.
Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

†. V.
That we are not to meruile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and Tanais of Scythia.

†. VI.
Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affixe vnto it.

†. VII.
Of the worshipping of Images, begunne from Belus in Babel.

†. VIII.
Of the Warres of Ninus: and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magick arts: and of diuers kinds of Magick.

†. I.
That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

†. II.
Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

†. III.
That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to bee condemned; though the deuill here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

†. IIII.
That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practises.

†. V.
The abuse of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

†. VI.
Of the diuers kinds of vniuersall Magick.

†. VII.
Of diuers ways by which the deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

†. VIII.
That none was euer raised from the dead by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Time of the birth of Abraham : and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis : with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

The answer to two more of the objections, shewing that we may have certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest sonne : and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two brethren should bee rejected.

The naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that hee was the eldest : together with diuers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides, with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

of the first Booke.

Of a computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings : and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to haue bene King, lies betwene Coeleſyria, and Arabia Petrea.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings. That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia : and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

That it is not improbable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came : which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the deliuerie of the Iſraelites from thence.

Briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Ægypt : with a note of the causes of difficultie in resolving of the truth in these points.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, & otherwise, it appears that Chams raigne in Ægypt beganne in the year after the Flood 191.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oftentimes many under one King.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Oſiris.

Of the time when Oſiris raigne ended : and that Iacob came into Ægypt in the time of Orus, the sonne of Oſiris.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptius, Orus, and the two Sesoſtres, successively raigning after Mizraim : and of diuers errors about the former Sesoſtres.

Of Buſiris, the first oppressor of the Iſraelites : and of his successor Queene Thermutis, that tooke up Moſes out of the water.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis : and what King it was, under whom Moſes was borne : and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuerie of Iſrael out of Ægypt.

OF the time of Moſes birth : and how long the Iſraelites were oppressed in Ægypt.

Of diuers Cities and Places in Ægypt mentioned in this storie or elsewhere in the Scripture.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

¶ I.
The conclusion wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were Associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrelled with Philip. They dealt insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being wearied for warre, obtains peace at Rome by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

¶ II.
The death of Philopoemen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the military profession is of all other the most whippie; notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to prove the contrarie.

¶ III.
Philip making provision for warre against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his owne subjects. His negotiation with the Bastarnæ. His cruelties. He suspecteth his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slain, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sonnes death, whom hee findeth to have beene innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, hee dieth.

¶ IIII.
How the Bastarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered Mafaniffa, cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him.

¶ V.
How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemnes his Enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The wofull stoutnesse of the Macedo-

§. I.

That the invisible God is seene in his Creatures.

OD, whome the wisest men acknowledge to be a power vneffable, and vertue infinite, a light by abundant claritie inuisible, an vnderstanding which it selfe can onely comprehend, an essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicitie, was and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which he imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the image of that glorie, which cannot bee measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious lights of heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine countenance, in his mercifull prouisiō for all that lue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the world vniuersall by the absolute art of his owne word, his power and almightinesse, which power, light, vertue, wisdom, and goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple essence, and one God, wee in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of celestiaall and terrestriall bodies: terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuorsities; celestiaall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and con-

trarie motions, are neither repugnant, internixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions their Almighty mouer.

In these more then wonderfull workes, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects all that liue witness in themselves, the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: for according to S. Gregorie, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, expressa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem ipsius, conspiciere in creaturis, to discern him in his providence in his creatures. That God hath bene otherwise seene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstanding, grounded on these places of S. Iohn, and S. Paul, Yee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue yee seene his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicities, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videndi non potest. That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that bee, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregorie Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregorie the Great, Euaristus, Aluinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne word, and by this visible world, is God perceived of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his creatures, whose Hieroglyphical Characters, are the vnumbred Stars, the Sunne, and Moone, written on these large volumes of the firmament: written also on the earth and the seas, by the letters of all those liuing creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cusanus, Mundus vniuersus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus, The world vniuersall is nothing else but God exprest. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seene by creation of the world, being considered in his creatures. Of all which there was no other cause preceding then his owne will, no other matter then his owne power, no other workman then his owne word, no other consideration then his owne infinite goodness. The example and patterne of these his creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged will moued, by his high wisdom disposed, and by his almighty power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his word, and by the effects of the worlds creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosque potest, sed vel ex verum, que facta sunt, queque sunt & gubernantur obseruatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot bee knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the obseruing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the word of God himselfe.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue bene created by

G O D.

Herm in Parnaxo mandat & in sermone loquitur.

His work, and creation of the world, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner exprest. I meane all those who are entitied by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Atercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum, The originall of the vniuersall: to whom he giueh also the attributes of Mens, natura, actus, necessitas, finis, & renouatio. And wherein he truly, with S. Paul, casteth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almighty word, and not by hands: verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word fire to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy Deut. 4. 24. and in S. Paul it is vsed) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are created or produced out of one fire.

Sodid Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God; whose remarkable wordes are thus conuerted. Cum abscon-
10 disset omnia IVPITER summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense: When great IVPITER had hid all things in himselfe, working out of the lone of his sacred heart, he sent thence or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable workes which he had forethought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most high, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus Pater Creator suumus. Plato calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall, totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinity: (it being true that the Scrip-
20 ture hath not want of any forraigne testimony) yet as the Fathers with others excellently learned are my examples herein; so S. Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God, among the Heathen, that he might therby take from them all escape by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them, that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Mendaces, and in the seuenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocumq; dicitur, à spiritu sancto est: and lastly let those kinde of men learne this rule: Qua sacra seruimus, prophana non sunt, Nothing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio.
Genes. 1. 1.

THis visible world of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullianus) things beganne to bee. This word beginning (in which the Hebrewes secke some hidden mystery, and which in the Iewes Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent: but only to creation then. For before that beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to inform, nor any being, but the eternall. Nature was not, nor the next parent of time begotten, time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of matter already in being, then as the word beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of matter proceeded from a greater power then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such a one (saith Laetantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made: whereupon it may be concluded, that matter could not be before this beginning: except we faime a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite, the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alter unus esset in altero finitum, There cannot be more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

Basil. Hexam.

After the creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters. The Seuenty Interpreters vñe the word super-ferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil, and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed virtutis cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil) which wordes incubare or fovere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall liking. Verbum tranlatum est ab auium pulcritudine sue incubantibus, quamuis spiri- tuali; & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo. The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volabat, The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldaean Paraphrast in this sense, uentus a conspectu Dei sufflatus, or as other vnderstand the Chaldaean, flabat, pellebat, remouebat: the winde from the face of God did blow vnder, drine, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalm.
He caused his winde to blow, and the waters increas: but there was yet no winde nor exhalation:
Arias Montanus in these wordes, Et spiritus Elohim Merachefet, id est, effica- citer motitans, confoens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God efficually and often mouing, keeping warme, and chersishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, causa, which is the diuine goodnesse, Iehi, which is, fiat, siue erit, let it be, or it shall be. Que vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit:
which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third Spiri- ritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, via quodam diuina, agilis ac presens per omnia per- tingens, omnia complectens, that is, a certaine diuine power, or strength euery where, active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; matter apt to become euery thing. For my selfe I am resolu'd (Cum Deus sit superrationale omni ratione, Seeing God us in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his won-derfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner and first operation of his diuine power cannot be conceiued by any minde, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quo Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esa) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to St. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality and operation, were by incubation, or how else, the manner is only knowne to God, quomodo in omnibus sit rebus, vel per effectum, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit &c. For how God (saith in Iohann. 17. 25. St. Augustine, speaking of this Vbiquitie) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. ¶ Nil inter Deum hominemq; distaret, si
confilia, & dispositiones illius manifestæ eterne, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could conceiue the counsels and disposing of that eternall Maiesty; and therefore to be ouer-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the creation of the world, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gaue forme to the matter of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his; who not contented with a knowne and safe foord, will presume to passe ouer the greatest Riuer in all parts, where hee is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one loofe his life, and the other his vnder-standing. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neare the fire; but if we seeke to outface the one, or enter into the other, we forthwith become blinde or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoeuer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeede bee truly called Principium motus, and with Mirandula, vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause, St. Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a winde or breath, sub nomine spiritus, vnder the name of a spirit, which is sometimes so taken:
or for virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or winde: Mercurius nameth it Spiritus tenuem intelligibilem, a pure or thine intelligible spirit: ANAXAGORAS, mentem. TOSTATVS, volantem & mentem Dei, The will and minde of God; which Mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh animam mundi,
The soule of the world: and in his sixth Booke de Republica he calleth it the law of Heauen; in his Epistles, the leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cy-prius wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox flet, & non mentium, sed etiam Angelorum: My minde faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but euen the voice of Angels: so may all men els say in the vnderstanding and vtterance of the wayes and workes of the Creation; for to him (saith Azianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi
est quicquid eius est, & quicquid est, whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or winde, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it, which maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORIE, Deus suo presentiale esse, ad omni- bis rebus esse, ita quod, si seceribus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihi- lum delacerent vniuersa; God giueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as, if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away, and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently.

Principio celum ac terras, camposq; liquentes,

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the heauens, saith Iob. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their spirituallity, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit, (which gaue heat and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten aire: an element, superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtille, diaphanick, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpiree: light, for the excellency thereof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, agnis à Deo instam, ex qua aque non solum motum, sed & vim procedendi animalia habuerint. He calleth it a vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the water; whereby the waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth liuing creatures.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

THese waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnted, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vnting of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these wordes, Let there be lights in the firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the first verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the seas, and creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, plants, minerals, and mans body: so may light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, and other lights of heauen. Howbeit neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that light it selfe, que causa est luciditatis, which is the cause, that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe and all things else visible) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greekes call Aether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum: the conductor, and preseruer, or nourisher of celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heauenly influences, but by the medium, or meanes of light. Aristotle calleth light, a quality, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better touched of the heat, which it transportheth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (say the Platonicks) absente lumine residet in subiecto, the light being departed doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporall, and so doth Montanus, Cuius claritas resistit, nec spatium: which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

Aristotle findeth corporallitie in the beames of light; but it is by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus,

giue materialty to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the heauen to the earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Crystalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by vnclane and vnpure earthy substances, lesse hard and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obstaculum naturæ terræ atq; solidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem: Because an obstacle, by nature, earthy and soule, doth not receive the pure clearenesse of light: alluding to that most diuine light, which only shineth on those mindes, which are purged from all worldly drossie, and humane vnclanneesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion: neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or latter Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beatus, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein; as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtille in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discouers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinity: of whom it may be truly said, Quodlibet sapientie odiosus acuminis nimis: Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought forth and deuoured) resolved vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet euery day we see the aire illightened: incorporall it cannot be, because it is sensible: sensible it is, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subiect: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, Lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darkenesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darkenesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be Lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtayne their so being of the light, and therefore, if we deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore be concludeth that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all Lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

But in my vnderstanding, lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Englished by Light; and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of heauen, or from any other light, is an image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentionall Species may be vnderstood by the example of a redde, or greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sunne through redde or greene glasse: for then wee perceiue the same colour cast vpon any thing opposit; which rednesse or other colour we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is dispersed, whether this light first continued be the same, which the Sunne inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer, then till the Sunnes creation. But by the most wise and vnchanged order, which God obserued in the worke of the world, I gather, that the light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Moses repeateth twice the maine parts of the vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused, and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called, Arida, or dry land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vntuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this light formerly dispersed, was in the fame fourth day vnited and set in the firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day God gaue no proper place or fixation, and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from waters) beganne to budde forth the budde of the hearbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite every part of the inferiour world; by his heate to liue vp the fire of generation, and to giue actiuitie to the feedes of all natures: For as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to bee erected, doth accommodate the fame to that vse and end, to which it was ordaind; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the light to be; which by his all-powerfull word he approued, and approving it dispensed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Ios, by what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth; we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith ESDRAS). And those which inhabit the heavens, doo only know the essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra, Nothing unknowne in heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res verae sunt in mundo inuisibiles, in mundo visibiles umbrae rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible but their shadowes: Surely if this light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth nearest vnto spirituality; and if it haue any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for how soeuer, it is of all things seen, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministrerh to men and other creatures all celestiall influences; it disperseth those fadde thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintaineth; it discouereth vnto vs the glorious workes of God, and carrieth vp with an Angellcall swiftnesse our eyes vnto heauen, that by the light thereof, our mindes being informed of his visible meruailes, may continually traualle to surmount these percieued heavens, and to finde out their omnipotent cause and Creatour. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet. It is the light, (saith St. Ambrose) that maketh the other part of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

Ouid, Met. l. i.

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Mundi oculus.*

The world discerneth it selfe, while I the world behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly,

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any farre-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the fame in the beauty, motion, and vertue of this light may be perceiued. Therefore was God called lux ipsa, and the light by Hermes named lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to bee that light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits, nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profectio non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est, nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith HERMES in POEMANDRO) certainly is not a minde, but the cause, that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masses and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and informed, was by the operative Spirit of God pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, refolued their thinner parts into aire, which God enlightened. The Earth also by being contigant, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the budde of the hearbe that seedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the light to be vnited, and gaue it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those feuerall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time, and times succeding.

ð. VIII.

Of the firmament, and of the waters about the firmament: and whether there be any cristalline heauen, or any primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine translation calleth firmamentum, for expansum (for so Platinius, and Ianius turne it) are not the cristalline Heavens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the fame place many learned arguments against this fancie. For the waters about the firmament, are the waters in the aire about vs, where the fame is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the wordes Raquia, which Montanus writeth Raktagh, and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heauen and for aire, and more properly for the aire and ether then for the Heavens, as the best Hebricians vnderstand them, quos suprema ac tenuia ab infimis crassis diducta interfecta, disarent, for that whereby the supreme and thinnest bodies were placed in distance being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters about the firmament exprest in the word Mayim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the aire, or in the vppermost Region of the fame.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the aire, the Scriptures euery where witness, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalm. * By these springs shall the fowle of the heauen dwell; and upon Sodome and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to Isaac, God giue thee therefore of the dew of heauen; and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land, whither you goe to possess it, is a land, that drinketh water of the raine of heauen; and in Ios, Who hath ingathered the frosts of heauen; and in St. MATTHEW, Behold the fowles of heauen, for they sow not.

So

Gen. 1. 1.

So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose toppe may reach to heauen, &c. and in this very place Basil a- nouetheth that this appellation of heauen for the firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne wordes be these, Et vocauit Deus firmamentum caelum. Hac appellatio aliq. quidem proprie accommodatur, huius autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this (that is, to the Firmament deuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other proofe, that by the firmament was meant the aire, and not the Heauen, the wordes of MOSES 10 in the eighth Verse conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse makes it manifest: for in the eight Verse it is written, that God called the firmament, which deuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse hee calleth the firmament of Heauen, aire, in these wordes: And let the foule flie vpon the earth in the open firmament of heauen: and what vse there should be of this icie, or cristalline, or waterie heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of beleefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia, but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and saith 20 it selfe (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conductor the word of truth, which also may be called lumen omnia rationis, & intel- lectus, the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scrip- tures teach it not) let those that can belceue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I can not: but of these many heauens, let the Reader, that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilus Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus his second Booke and sixt Chapter. For my selfe I am perswaded, that the waters called the waters about the heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendred in the vppermost aire.

§. I X.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and 40 when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, he created the matter of all things: and in the first three daies he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme, the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, deuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the firmament into one place. In the last three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the world: he set in the firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all, that haue life, a power generative, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to creatures vegetatiue and growing, their feedes 50 in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

§. X.

That nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into euery creature, ha- 10 uing no other selfe-ability, then a Clocke; after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the sterne of a shippe, and finding it guided by the helme and rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration. If the hand, that guides it, or of the iudgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all A- 20 gents worke whatsoeuer they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choise by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde only, that giueth abilitie, life, and mo- tion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties; and by men, as by severall organs, seuerall effects; all second causes whatsoeuer being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they haue receiued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerywhere-pres- 30 ence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours; to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to contayne raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God giueth them, would become alto- 40 gether silent, vertuelesse, and dead: of which excellently ORPHEVS; Per te vire- cunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues, which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heauenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues praise him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flatter- 50 rie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) si facultas inueniende veritatis huic studio subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nul- lum ibi esse sapientiam, If in this stuaie (saith he) were meanes to finde out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de vniuersa precisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum sci- 60 entia necessarij haberetur, If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philoso- phers were ignorant in nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more cu- rious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first mat- ter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take conseruence, it hath not bene taught; neither are these formes (saith a learned Authour) any thing, si ex ea exprimentur 70 potentia,

potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subiectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceiue: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, diuine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter and forme, then between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rationall consideration. Leaving therefore these riddles to their louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions writ and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the world, I thinke it faire safer to asseme with S. AVOVSTINE, I hat all species and kinds are from God, from whom whatsoeuer is natural proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; estimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith he) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be prevented or furthered.

ND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be fairly receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inexcusable necessity, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Lucretius.

Iunen sat. 7. 101

3. c. 43.
Pict. in 12. de
4. 5.
G. de fat.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscilianists, the Bardilianists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but, that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plinius out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferior bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inexcusable necessity, and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vniuerso, nostrum fatum est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne set: it being manifest, that the diuersity of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so vncreated by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keep one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs, and fountaines, taines, to cold earth, to plants and stones, Minerals, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should wee robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number: add of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasury of his wisdom he who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euery starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery hearbe, plant, fruit, and flower, adorning the face of the Earth hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer and shadow her dusty face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feede them and cure them: so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments and organs of his diuine providence, so faire as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the firmament, &c. affirmeth that the Starres are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes) but are as open bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracides withall. That there are hidde yet greater things then these be, and we haue scene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacitie of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and vttermost vertues of hearbs and plants, which our selues slow and set, and which grow vnder our feete, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiall bodies: for hardly (saith SALOMON) can we discern the things that are vpon the earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuigilate the things that are in heauen? Mulsum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: Aristotle. It is nought to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen we doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of destinie, so on the contrary we doe not robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes depouled God of his prerogatiue, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustificable; of whom S. AVOVSTINE, Impia peruersitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorem (scilicet, quàm commissorem) scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill doers, they againe with wicked peruersesse urge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

Aug. 20. super Gen. ad lit.

But that the Starres and other celestiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitiue appetite, which is also stirred by the configuration and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexionem, & dispositionem. The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in vs habits, complexion, and dispositions: for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath vnderbodily a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and mindes weak in vertues: for those of cholerick complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her vasailes, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse minde I am refused: For all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and executioners of Gods providence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whoeuer shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect it, it conquers thee.

Quint.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as afore said, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibulum corporum confert; &

Aug. de ciuit. Dei. lib. 5.

ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AUGUSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith St. Ambrose.) And St. AUGUSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above, but he auoucheth not that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens minds, which are incorporeall.

Hor. lib. 4. d. l.
4. 39.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in nature and art, that encounter the fume, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferior bodies, no more then the signes of raine and wind doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in luculentis patrum virtus; In the young offspring the fathers vertue is, and so the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an entercange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vitious men, to vertue.

A worthy sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods refered power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion a few, and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the raine being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiaritie, and the examples of disolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retain a fauour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet fauour of vertue first receiued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a fauourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily artie, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding vertuous or vitious, heauen and earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the strength of selfe nature and kinde could haue yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soile futable, and like themselves, are made more vnfaunoury and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientis adiunxit opus agrorum, quemadmodum agricola terra naturam: A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the husbandman helpeth the nature of the soile. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapientis, & omnia sapientis medici dominantur astris, A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall preuaile against the starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the starres, as he did the rest of the vniuersall, whose influences may be called his referued and vnwritten lawes. But let vs consider how they binde: euen as the lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the world haue by their lawes decreed, that a theefe and a murderer shall suffer death; and though their ordinances are daylie by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodnesse, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of prayer by our Saviour taught. And let vs not be leade vnto temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of wordes and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himselfe should in a kinde haue shut vp him selfe therein.

How miserable then were the condition of men (saith St. AUGUSTINE) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the Starres were so transfer'd, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so beleneeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginarie Gods of the other would thereby be depoulted of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father (I haue finished the worke which thou gavest me to doe.) And the same God, who hath threatned vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs inuitably to the destinies, or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well said of Plinius, that the starres were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I doe not content with those, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that we derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis, Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light. But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Providence, Prefcience, and Predestination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

¶ XII. Of Prefcience.

40 Prefcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prefcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoeuer our selues fore-know, except the same be to succcede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prefcience of God (as it is Prefcience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succceeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the world shall die againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Sommer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in vs binde or constrain the Sunne to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith Bertrius) beholdeth those things subiect to sense, sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is a horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own natures. And againe out of the same Authour. Divina providentia rebus generalibus non imponit necessitates, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret. Divine providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euill.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

NOW Providence (which the Greekes call Pronoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith St. Augustine) is deuoted into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future; and we our selues account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures euerywhere teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hercof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompanie and visit each other, in the most pestilent discases, nor shunne any perill whatsoeuer, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prouing Providence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall neede to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith DAVID) which conuerth the heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the mountaines, which giueth to beasts their foode, and feedeth the young Ravens that cries: all thef waite vpon thee, that thou maist giue them foode in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the riuers Cheareth (saith God to ELIAH) and I haue commanded the Ravens to feede thee there. Behold the Fowles of the aire, they sow not, nor reape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: againe, are not two sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haire of your head are numbered. And St. PETER, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you; And his iudgements are written (saith DAVID.)

God therefore, who is euery where present, who filleth the heauens and the earth, whose eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne word. Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not giue my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euery where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall prouidence is seene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beasts and birds and all liuing for their young ones. If prouidence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall. Amor diuinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est modus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque eius immobile sustentaculum, ac vniuersae

vniuersae machina fundamentum, The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chaine of the world, and the immouable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the vniuersall. God therefore who could onely be the cause of all, can onely prouide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power, to euery-where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute and transcendent habit of Providence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIII.

Of Predestination.

NOW for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, then in this, that Prescience only fore-seeth: Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of heauen, to the vnworthiest wormes of the earth, and Predestination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernardus Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely somtimes: among whom St. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two societies, vseth these wordes, Quarum vna est, quae praedestinata est in aeternum regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo, whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to undergoe euerylasting torment with the Deuill: for according to NONIVS MARCELLVS, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Caluin, Beza, Buchananus, Danew, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hercof arising, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt: He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmitie perceiueh the reason of his blindness. And againe with St. AUGUSTINE, Osculta esse causa potest, iniusta esse non potest: Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vniust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against reason and Providence.

NASTLY, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subseqent to Gods prouidence, and seeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificium Dei Organum, The art, or artificial Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum, The instrument of the diuine precept, we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus; as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messenicks. The Greekes call her tyxw signifying a relative being; or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard off; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit Gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward shee grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to beggers and cottages, these ordered all things, resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, inasmuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her palmitres: of which PALLADIUS, Vita hominum ludus fortune est, The life of man is the play of Fortune; and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels haue equall successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same externall figure with Sapience: wherof Athenæus.

Aur. viii. de pertinet. Sen. ep. 74
Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is said to haue vied to crie out vpon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of ÆSCHYLVS. Tu me extulisti, eadem me is (sentio) 10 perdim.

Longissime à Sapientia Fors absidet, Sed multa perfcit tamen similis.

From wisdom Fortune differs farre,
 And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeuours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non precesserit, Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aguinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoeuer may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen besides the intention of the inferior, but not besides the intention of the superior: Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit) the ordinance of God; and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Peste fortunam, nos Deum appellamus, Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the law of murder. He that 30 smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death, and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now where the Scripture hath these wordes, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance, and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby an other is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academikes to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi, the soule of the world, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, gouerning euery being aswell in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by ineuitable ordinance: sometime, the stile of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect speaketh St. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which seeth was: For whatsoeuer (saith he) 50 thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

Prov. 33.
Spec. 1.4. c. 7.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chaunce were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe, how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and and emptie-headed fooles; that riches and honour are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and dejected estates. In a word there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the falsioning and not falsioning of our selues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue, for whoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discerne, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth, if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourte then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euer more hang vnder the wheele, which kinde

10 of deseruing well and receiuing ill, wee alwaies fallily charge Fortune withall. For whoeuer shall tell any great man or Magistrate, that he is not iust, the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire, shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie, but he must also change with the successe, if he be of contrary qualities, faile with the tide of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an obsequant flauish course? These men haue nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeite kinde of wondering at other men, and by making them beleue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dustie actions cristalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogans & plausus capitur, Euery foole is woone with his owne pride and others flattering applaus: so as whoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obserue them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend 30 in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the author of his owne miserie, but best it were to follow the aduise, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heresie raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
 Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world began not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTVS, Potuisse (saith PE- 40 TRARCH) in lectulo suo mori, potuisset integro caduere sepe viri, He might then haue died the death of nature; and bene with an vntime and vnaduersed body buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid sustinens quam desperantem (preferim de efflu) litibus perpetuis implicari, What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be entangled with endless contentions? Whoeuer therefore will set before him Machiauels two markes to shooe at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a backe of yron to a weake wooden bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuised to adde failes to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them, as being fultened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his failes, as the diuers natures of Calmes and stormes require, must cut his failes, and his cloth, of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure nauigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the

the rest, or of whatsoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishness) of man hath found out: let vs resolue with St. Paul, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him 3 there are diuerities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

Gen. 1. 26.

De volunt. Dei.
Plat. leg. 1. 1.

HE creation of all other creatures being finished, the heuens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likenesse.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingens miraculum homo, man is the greatest wonder (saith Plato out of MERCURIUS;) Natura ardentissime artificium, The artificial worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie externall, but in respect of his internall forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortall, and spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before,
So man began to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and dominion, as St. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which St. Ambrose denyeth to the woman in these wordes, Ut sicut Deus vnus, ab eo feret homo vnus, & quando ex Deo vno omnia, ita ex vno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terre: Vnus igitur vnus fecit, qui vnitatis eius habet imaginem, That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following wordes of the same Verbe, that man was after the image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule ouer the fish of the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortall soule only, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible, as God is immortall and incorpall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorpall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the body of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the body: Animae est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte, The soule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betwene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betwene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threds, with subtle distinctions, many times the plainnesse, and incertie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth through and dissolueth the purest gold. Viliorum alio maketh the image of God to be substantiall, but not the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratum, A word-declaring qualitie in the substance. Out of which wordes, and that which followeth, it is infer'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinnefull soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God; but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. St. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoeuer the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that St. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Viliorum doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the wordes image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as St. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so St. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these wordes. Therewith blese wee God cum the Father, and sheweth curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God: Howsoeuer therefore St. Augustine seemeth, out of a kinde of elegance in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Conferuntur imaginem in aternitate similitudinem in mortalibus inueniri, we confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde, yet thus he eliewhere speaketh plainly. Quasi vero possit esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est, As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The verie wordes of the Text make this most manifest, as Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verbe following God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) only, as thus. God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguitie, in the first

1. cor. 15. 49.
vs. supra.
Ans. et sup.

first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, in the day that God created A DAM, in the likenesse of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Colof. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Siracides it is written, he made them according to his image. Now if we may beleuee S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and minde: Nulla pars in homine qua non fuerit huiusce imaginis participes, No part in a man (saith he) which was not part:icipating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soule. The body of man (saith he) is the Image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said that Moyses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the body only: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, hee meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AVGVSTINE), Cursed is he that referrcth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans body. Deus enim non est humane forme participes, neque corpus humanum diuine (saith PHILLO), God is not partaker of humane forme, nor human: body of the forme diuine: The Hebrew word for image is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo, Man passeth away in a shadow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his nature and his word; an error of the Anthropomorphic, against the very essence and Maiesty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura, The vertue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is mercifull: God is charitie it selfe, and (in a word) goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much he hath pleased God himselfe: to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexceivable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in domiion alone: for the Deuill is said to be the Prince of this world, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortal soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Demones, because sciters of Knowledge, and subtilty; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea euen of shamefull parts of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemn the opinion of St. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching domiion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Domiion, such as it ought to bee, that is, accompanied with iustice and pietie: for God did not only make man a ruler and Governour ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the field; but God gaue vnto man a domiion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude reason, as it is the abilitie of vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Trenauis did therefore call man, the image of God, because hee was animal ratione only; but that he vnderstood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens, Man, that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creator, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said St. Augustine (who herein came nearer the truth) fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente, God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne image and similitude; 3 and REYNERIVS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

¶ I I.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the image of God: and that this image is much deformed by sinne.

BUT Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis, The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, vis actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellectuall minde contemplatiue. *Est autem mens nostra (saith CYSANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totius virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompanie his wordes) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees and others) and not otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith Mercurius) est Deus in hominibus, Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; or the lumen anime rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animam, The soule of the soule, or with St. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, que amoris sapientie tanquam ducent sequitur, which followeth after the lone of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which and reason, between which and the minde, called anima, between which and that power which the Latines call animas, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discourse; Animas, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Animas corpus animat, id est, viuificat; anima, or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth it life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great director hath in the world, the same hath this Animas, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basilagreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, peritiam animae partem, the perceiuing part of the minde, or the light, by which the Soule discerneth: *dormitionum mens, non animas, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet, in men that sleepe it is this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the minde or soule, which resteth, during which time it is but habituall in wise men, and in made men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the Soule: for made men doe liue, though distract.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abluely to made men, when we say that they are of a distract minde, in read of a broken vnderstanding, which word (mind) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or that minde: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or, a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as I doe this for my minds sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (mens) for the phantastic, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discouf: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is vfed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that, which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and 10 apt to be disseuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently Mercurius: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti praest, mens anima, anima corpori, The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the image of God. Gods President or ruler ouer this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the body. This diuision and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudgeof. That Mens humana hath no neede of any organ, Marsilius Ficinus in his ninth booke of the Soules immortallitie laboureth to proue.

Zanch. de oper. Dei. part. 3. lib. 1. cap. 2.

Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in wordes, for (saith he) ad facilitatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquam medio per quod intelligat, quamquam 20 eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intelligentem concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, scilicet rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulacra ad phantasiam prolata. To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the minde of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whercon to looke, and whence to conceive the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasies, or the resemblances of things receiued from the sense, and carried to the phantasie: But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrarie sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the vnderstanding. And hee addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his vnderstanding and minde, as 30 colours are to the sight: whence it fo followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it selfe is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing, and as this is an Organum: so that. Of this question, How the Minde in all her actions maketh vse of the body, and hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue and learned discouf in the last Reple of Mr. Dr. Bislon, now Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henrie Iacob. Howlouer the truth bee determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discouf, nor in respect of the minde it selfe, by which we liue, nor in respect of our fowles simply, by which we are immortall, that we are made after the image of God. But most safely may wee resemble our selues to God in mente, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all.

P. 185. &amp; sequens.

Ad imaginem Dei creauit illum, id est, sapientie virtutem, ac bonitatem potentem, qui se intuius Creatoris agnouerit suum, atque imitari, proinde, ingenio, proinde, auctoritatis, non concessit ratione fluere.

Exata.

For St. Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the image of God, whose words are these: Non propter id imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, scilicet, intelligit & diligit (which was also the opinion of S. AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loneth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And, that this image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiis affectibus immergit, Alan was made after the image and similitude of God, but Sinne hath deformed the beautil of this image, and made 40 it it vnprofitable by drawing our mindes into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortallitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteoufnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberallitie, that wee were printed with the scale of Gods image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the Soule 10 is a part of the essentiall constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into earth, and contriued within the truncke of dust and clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne iustice, pietie, and righteoufnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retaine the image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the waies of God, which in the Scriptures is called walking with God; and all other men 20 so long retaine this image, as they feare, loue, and serue God, truly, (that is) for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruite and deface his scale by the waight of manifold and voluntarie offences, and obstinate finnes. For the vniuersall minde cannot bee after the image of God, seeing God is iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is charitie, and mercie it selfe: Falldowne, cunning practise, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God; and to be shord, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautil and deformitie, or betweene righteoufnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this image of Gods goodnesse, which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and duresse pleasures of this stage-play world, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanlip of Gods wisdom, and the liberallitie of his mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest heauens, and thence bring knowledge and Object to the minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during glorie, and termelesse ioy, prepared for those, which retaine the image and similitude of their Creator, preserving vndisfled and vrent the garment of the new man, which, after the image of God, is created in righteoufnesse, and true holinesse, as saith St. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by St. Augustine with whom S. Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the image is lost, and not the image it selfe; both opinions by 40 this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the image of God, in man, may be taken two waies; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the image of God is no more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost: (for sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts) or the image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of diuine grace, and heavenly glorie, which is indeede the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall image; and this manner of similitude and image of God, is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

¶. III.

Of our base and fraile bodies : and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall Soule.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of redde earth, or, ex limo terre, out of the slime of the earth, or a mixed matter of earth and water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex glaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & molissima, Not that God made an Image or Statue of clay, but out of clay, earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blond, and bone, with all parts of man.

That Man was formed of earth and dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome. Let not my Lord now be angrie, if I speake, I, that am but dust and ashes: And in these houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabit, according to Iob 3, and though our owne eyes doe euer where behold the fudden and resistlesse assaults of death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our bodies are but the Antidotes of paine and diseases, and our Mindes the Huiues of vnnumbred cares, sorrowes, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posits, 20 against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance, which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this vassall and slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leasure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither die with the reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-liuing subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great accompt? neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: we pleade for titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for riches, while our strength enleath vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time 30 hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must goe the way, from whence we shall not returne, and that our bedde is made ready for vs in the darke: And then I say, looking ouer late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues, we behold therein the fearful images of our actions past, and wchall, this terrible inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue cuer moued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs affraide? we behold other mens Tragedies plaide before vs, we heare what is promised and threatned: but the worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which we only see) doe neither looke vp towards termelisse ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till we neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the worlds hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil deniq; morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, ipsis, periculis
Tentati, nihilo meliores reddimur vniquam, Sub vicijs nullo culpærum sine manentes.*

Diseases, famine, enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But

But let vs not flatter our immortall soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his lawes and precepts. Frastra sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur, They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, quia in his sibi flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

¶. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man, in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcase God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing soule: (that is) God gaue to a Bodie of earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodilic instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of life and immortalitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIHY in Iob) bat made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) videnda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirasse in sacrum formati, ut vincto possit, & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tus fecerunt me, &c. tropica ha locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, quas solent homines operari, loquutus est. In which sentence (saith he) *the begger liues of carnall sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy handes haue made me, spake this tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hys, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt: In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall sense. By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que viuificat corpus, & animat, Which doth animate, and giue life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Iob; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the body returneth vnto the earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) vniuallly otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Iesus receiue my spirit: and in St. Iohn, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue vp the Ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beasts, the manner of the creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and les the earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face breath of life. Wherefore, as from the water and earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receined life: so shall they againe be dislolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath euermasting, which God breathed into man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.*

p. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Winterfall: in whom God concluded the creation, and worke of the world; and whom he made the last and most excellent of his creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which he might contemplate and see his Creator, after whose image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the world, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature; he vouchsafed vnto man; both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensuall of Beasts; and the properall belonging vnto man; and therefore (saith GREGORIE NAZANZENE:) Homo est triuitalis, natura vinculum, Adam is the bond and chaine which bindeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall; and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts thereof, therefore was man called Microworld; or the little world. Deus igitur hominem saluauit, uelut aliterum quendam mundum, in breui imaginem, atque exiguu totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the earth the man whom he had made, as it were another world, the great and large world in the small and little world: for out of earth and dust was formed the flesh of man; and therefore heauie and lumbie; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard rocks and stones, and therefore strong and durable: of which Ouid.

Ouid. Met. l. 1.

*Inde genus durum sumus, experientie laborum,
Et documenta domus, que sumus origine nati.*

From thence our kinde hard hearted is; enduring paine and care, Approouing that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the bodie, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by brookes and riuers ouer all the earth; his breath to the aire; his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth, which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth. Our radical moisture, oile, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitie of the earth; the haire of mans body, which adorns or ouerhadowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering, and vnsable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our cies, to the light of the Sunne and Moone, and the beauty of your youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat drie vp, & wither away, or the fierce pusses of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our minde; to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwaies looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwaies present with God; and lastly our immortal soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his own image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: (for in Angeli deprehensi est stultitia, Behold, be found folly in his Angels, (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betwene the substance, and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousnes.

In

Job 4. 18.

In this also is the little world of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which we seeme onely to lue and growe, as Plants; the second age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third age to Venus, the dayes of loue, desire, and vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we begin to take accompt of our times, iudge of our selues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seventh to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which wee finde by deere and lamentable experience, and by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are sicknes, and variable infirmities; and by how much the more we are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whome when Time hath made vnforcible to others, we become a burthen to our selues: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches we haue, from our succellours. In this time it is, when (as afore said) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we passe vnto, with many sighes, groanes, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we alwaies trauaile both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honour and riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the promises of glorious entertainments; but by what crooked path so euer we walke, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose doores lie open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall ebbe and falling streame, but neuer floweth againe: once leafe once fallen, springeth no more, neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new leaues and flowers.

maintained; but as therein is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sappe and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preferred, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwaies either encreasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first creation, to dispose of himselfe.

Here be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to trie his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed)

Eccl. 1. 5. 14.

God gaue man to himselfe, to be his owne guide, his owne workeman, and his owne painter, that he might frame or describe vnto himselfe what he pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith STRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his own counsaile. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse brought with them into the world (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dammes, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernall spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kinde of seedes and grafts of life, (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of beastes, the rationall of man, and the intellectuall of Angels, whereof which sooner he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futuramente grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choyce and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Aclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as hee pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from reason to brutallie, from vertue to vice, from meekenesse to crueltye, and from iustice to oppression. For by the liuely image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified deceders; by Lions, oppressours, and cruell men; by swine, men giuen ouer to lust and sensualitye; by wolues, rauening and greedy men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolues, by the images of stones and stockes, foolish and ignorant men, by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which Saint Iohn Baptist, O see generation of vipers, &c.

Matth. 3. 7.

§. VII.

Of Gods causing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Vniuersall created was exceeding good.

In this worke of man God finished the creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse, with whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God foretell, that hee left the world made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for my father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke; but Iohn 5. 17.

God

God rested, (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and flowers their seedes in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the earth, and the earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were, for God made euery Plant of the field before it was in the earth, but he gaue to all things which he had created the name of good; thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceede no impure or imperfect effect. For man hauing a free will and liberall choyce, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltye of mans heart, was the earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the firstage destroyed: but the righteous man Nobah, and his familie, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

This the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marneile that men should erre.

CONCERNING the first habitation of man were said, that the Lord God planted a garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made. GEN. 2. 6. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue been in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceiued the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the heauens) the way how to finde out and iudge, in what region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one error is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand children, if the licentiousnesse thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obsequant sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleued in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) magnum errorem (magnum virorum auctoritate persuasum) transmissimus, ut passim oves many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men ledde and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their learning and their peticie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakness. Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus, God neuer gave the knowledge of all things to any one. St. Paul confest that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to St. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi innuitur? (saith I o n) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? 10 man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folie in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabit in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOW as touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradise or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mytical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Hidkel, and Perath, The tree of life, and the tree of knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riuers were meant the foure Cardinal vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oile, Wine, Milke, and Honnie. This Allegorical vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Francisus Georgius receiued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke, fol. 338. the last Edition.

St. Ambrose also leant wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third heauen, and in the vertues of the minde, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or vnderstanding; by Eue, the sense; by the Serpent, delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinthians, c. 6. he in direct wordes alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which St. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug Chrysostomus, was of opinion, that a Paradise had bene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Menicbes also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion Padiamus inclineth, as I conceiue his wordes in two fowerall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. *Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vt tunc erat) fructibus consistam, sedem & hortum illud Ade & posteritatis future fuisse, These wordes (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule ouer euerie creature, doe clearly shew, that the vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. *Apostolus ex vno sanguine guine omne genus humanum adeo factum docet, vt habitarent super vniuersam faciem terra: ita igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Georgius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Georgius hindeth neare the Riuer of Acisines, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonsancturus, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and Possellius, quite contrarie vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sick of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by sed. in Gen. Masius. But as Hopkins saies of Philo iudeus, that he wondred, quo malo gemo afflatus, Pet. Comest. l. i. By what euill Angel he was blowne up into this error: so can I not but greatly meruaile at these learned men, who so grossly and blindly wandered; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region, in which it was planted, by the Kingdomes and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuers which watered it, and by the points of the compasse vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudaea, or Canaan.

Xenocrismus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith hee) hath the same beautie ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Tigrus, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Aegypt, and the other two through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one fountaine, were it not out of the fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

O the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written. And the Lord God Gen. 2. planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And how foucer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuered this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradysum voluptatis a principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the Heuene Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Nowne appellatiue; which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soile, of the many beautifull riuers, and goodly woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keep their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantesse or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposit to the Ile of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region, called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, and yet both are the proper names names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seentic; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodore, Gregorie; and to the Rabbin, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damasenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasenus owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confitus; Paradise is a place, meruallously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Gnilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words. After this I will beginne to speake of Paradise terrestrial, which that God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Posthas incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; *Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constitum in regione terre Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus CHAM habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Country, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERRERIUS endeoureth to qualifie this translation: for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ, that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better judgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduise himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden, Collocant Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledge, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientalis borti Heden, Cherubin; Hec set on the East side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BECANUS affirmeth that the Hebrew word (Be) significeth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end, to finde Paradise vpon the riuer of Aclines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of knowledge, of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.*

Now, because Paradise was sited by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damasenus;) affirming, that we alwaies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwaies toward the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudea, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way wee turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on earth: so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, and the Kingdome of heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myleric in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwaies called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ouid:

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataeq, regna recessit, Persidag, & radis iuga subdita matutini.

The East winde with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabian, and the Persian hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatning the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe flood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East toward the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, From the first part of the world, (a principio) id est (saith he) a primordio parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (a principio and ad Orientem) haue the same signification; From the beginning and Eastward is all one, a principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooffe of this place, and that this Storie of mankind was not allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the second Chapter and ninth Verse, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the world at large, and then, put him into the garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it and keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestrial garden, garnished with fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey nere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the truth and Storie of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gebon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est fons, non flumen, non folia, non uemedit Ena de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias renouantur. If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no riuer, if no riuer, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such riuer, as Pison, or Gebon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues, Eue then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon Daniel. Conticefant eorum deliramenta, quæ vmbrae & imagines in veritate frequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbore; putent Allegorie legibus se debere subtrahere. Let the dotages of them be silent, who following Phadomes and images in the truth, endeavour to subvert the truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the rivers and the trees under the rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gave Adam free libertie to eat of every tree of the Garden, (the tree of knowledge excepted) which trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beastes to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beastes were neither in the third heaven, nor neere the circle of the Moone, nor beastes in imagination: for if all these things were enigmaticall or mysticall, the same might also bee said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Affryan Kings vth this speech. All the trees of Eden, which were in the garden of God, enuied him, which 10 proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to bee terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginarie comparisōs. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if hee had not described both the region and the rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeuing Israelites, and others after them, would haue misconstrued this storie of mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we finde that the valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnaturall sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and foyle of farre exceeding excellencie.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gene. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elisian fieldes, but out of the Storie of Paradise: to which also appertaine those verses of the golden age in Onid.

Vcr erat aeternum, placidus, tepentibus auris Mulscentibus Zephyri natos sine fine sinis flores.

The ioyfull Spring did euer last,
And Zephyrus did breede
Without the helpe of seede Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pyndarus, Hesiodus and Homer, and after him, Onid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their sectatours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stollen treasures of diuine letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetically conuerfions, as if they had bene conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the river that ranne out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote, 50 And yet I doe not exclude the allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith St. Augustine)

*Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiae: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroq; modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion St. Augustine approbeth; and of which Sirias giueth this allowable iudgement. Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simpliciter erat: sic & huius sanctissimum mentis, sensibilis simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est praeditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: 10 so was his holie groue or garden to be taken both waies, and endued with a double forme.*

§. IIII.

why it should be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUt it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kinde of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answere, that there is nothing written in the Scriptures, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is a so made more apparent. For if we should conceiue that Paradise were not on the earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne world, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into Iudea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the world, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Phisim should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two 30 Rivers so farre distant, as (except all the world were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, if the birth, and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue bene in some such Countre, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his miracles had bene performed in the aire, or no place certainly knowne, I assure my selfe, that the Christian religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the minds of men: for times and places are approued witness of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relie, or giue place to the iudgements of some writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleue that there were a peece of the world so set by it selfe and separated, as to hang in the aire vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and runne vnder all the Ocean, and rise vp againe in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found. Which lest any man thinke, that I enforce or straine to the work, these are Peter Comestors owne wordes. Est autem locus amantissimus longo terra & mari tractu a nostra habitabili zona secretus, adu eleuatus, ut vsque ad Lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, seuered from our habitable zone by a long tract of land and Sea-landed, so that it reacheth to the globe of the Moone.

50 And Moses Barcephaz vpon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque re- sponsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hac nostris aetheribus, cog. fieri, ut illinc per precipitum delabantur flumini tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possumus; cog. impetu in pulsi pressi, sub Oceani vada rapiuntur, vnde rursum profusant ebulliant; in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which haue this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we giue this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these riuers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as wordes cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsive and preit, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe arise and boile vp in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumacta regione, non alter atq; Luna orbis Lunam cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compassse or embrace the whole earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expolitions and opinions doe to not bring question vnto truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discouer the true place of Paradise, which God and his wisdome appointed in the very Nauell of this our world, and (as Michaelston saies) in partem terrae meliorem, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Viuerisill might be filled with people, and planted; and by knowing this place, wee shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, and of the worlds inhabitation: for near vnto this did the Sonnes of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote Regions and Countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forerethers haue come, and out of what Regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Auncceler, from whence all the streames and branches of mankind haue followed and bene deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine the fuerrall opinions before remembered, by the Truth it selfe; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightful Garden.

§. V.

That the flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused hills in the earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the flood the cause of those high mountaines, which are found on all the earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for my owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had bene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeares after the flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the very garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the riuers still remaine the same riuers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these riuers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a riuer to water the garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine translation (Indus) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe,

Gen. 2. 10.

selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision and branching of those riuers must be in the North or South side of the very garden (if the riuers runne as they doe, North and South) and therefore these riuers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly knowne, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that either these riuers were turned out of their courses, or new riuers created by the flood which were not, or that the flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it beganne to decrease, was the cause of high hills, or deepe vallies. For what descent of waters could there bee in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is not high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that vntill the waters ranke, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the winde to blow, to drie vp the abundant slime and mudd of the earth, and make the land more firme, and to cleanse the aire of thicke vapours and vnwholesome mists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right riues doe euermore disscuer the violence of outrageous winds, and beate downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and flows there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfs to receiue a flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the earth and waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moued with any raging or ouerbearing violence. And for more direct proofe that the flood made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph. auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes, which pillars were set vp about 1426. yeares before the flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the erection of them, and Ioseph. himselfe, to haue liued some 40. or 50. yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleue all that he wrote, yet that, which he auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene: Now that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch built by Cain, about the mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented fragment) saith, were to be seene in his daies, who liued in the reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his wordes be not true, then was he exceedingly impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort. Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Cinis Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt, The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that region, the Citie of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Soppa was built before the flood, ouer which brother Cepha was King: whose name with his brother Phineas, together with the grounds and principles of their religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first Citie of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

And to proue directly, that the flood was not the cause of mountaines, but that there were mountaines from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood ouerflowed by fiftene cubits the highest mountaines. And Asius Damascenus speaking of the

the flood, writeth in this manner. Et supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confuentes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos. And vpon Minyada there is an high mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fledde in the time of the deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now although it is contrarie to Gods word, that any more were saved then eight persons (which Mafius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such mountaines were before the flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; and on which mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntuly, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Syon (though by another name) was knowne before the flood: on 10 which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved themselves also; but (as Annius saith) without all authoritie, either diuine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the flood did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, shee returned with an Olive leafe in her mouth, which shee had pluckt, and which (vntill the trees were discouered) shee found not: for otherwise shee might haue found them floating on the water; a manifest prooffe, that the trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written, solum Olive, rapum or decerpitum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written 20 to the contrarie) that the flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the worlds creation, and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this discouerie.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of those foure Riuer.

THis conceit of Aug. Chysamenis being answered, who only giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few wordes examine that of the Manichies, of Nouiomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many wordes, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus allegeth, bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the earth and subdue it, rule over euery creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the world was made for man, of which he was Lord and Gouernour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of blood originally; and Adams posteritie inhabited in proceesse of time ouer all the face of the earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular garden, assigned to Adam to dresse and cultiue, in which he liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had beene left to the vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said Eastward in Eden, seeing the world hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God bene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the vniuersall had beene Paradise? for then must Adam haue beene chased also out of the world. For if all the earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driuen out of the world into the world, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleue with Metrodorus, that there were infinite worlds. Which to denie; he thinks all one, as to as- 30 firme, firm, that in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one thistle. Now 10 MACVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riuer, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates, (which water three portions of the world so farre dilant) to rise out of one fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the world for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four riuer, being so vnderstood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pisnon was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gebon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a riuer by Himalab in India, and Nilus runne through Ethiopia. The Seuentic write Chus for Ethiopia, and there- 10 by the errors of the Manichies, and the mistakings of Nouiomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture farre more probable, then that of Ephram, Cyrius, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrey, in which hee was created, and was buried at Mount Caluarie, in Iherusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the flood, yet Adams thinn-bones must haue contained a thousand sidome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the aire.

Hirdly, where as Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Baſcepius conceived, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted about the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the 30 Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Peterius laies it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Mr. Rabanus;) and whereas Rupertus in his Geographic of Paradise, doth not much differ from thether, but finds it seated next or nearest heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neither of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for heauen it selfe, into which the soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Aeropagites, (in this 40 and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleueed in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one only powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and St. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as 50 his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Terullian and Ensebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place afore said, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Aeroliones) which being about all clouds of raine, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their many yeares) are called Macrotioi (that is) Long-lined. A further argument is vsed, for prooffe of the height of this 50 place, because therein was Enoch preferred from the violence of the flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Terullian conceiued, that the blessed soules were preferred till the last iudgement; which Irenaeus, and Iustine Martyr also beleueed. But this opinion was of all Catholike Diuines reproued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which St. Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement.

judgement. Sicut certum est ENOCH & ELIAM nunc viuere : ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est : (that is ) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue : so where they now liue, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephas giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessarie that Paradise should be set at such a distance and heighth, because the foure Ri- uers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterwards haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Aegypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and drames haue beene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins and Pererius writing vpon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few : for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuentour.

It is first therefore alleged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in : for being set so neare the Moone, it had beene too neare the Sunne, and other hea- venly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue beene too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the aire in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue aby- ding. Fourthly, because the place between the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolomie and Alfraganus) is leuenteene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes by a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereup- on it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this heighth, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis & foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eies of men : seeing, it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neare those fairs of waters, are deafe from their infancie, like those which dwell neare the Catadupa, or ouer-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I haue scene in the Indies, farre greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwel- ling neare them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) ci- teth Basil and Ambrose together : to which PERERIUS, Sed ego haec apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis quae nunc exstant, nusquam me legere memini ; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of Heaven, and the seede must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith St. PAUL) but all shall be changed : which change, in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest that by the flood all perished on the earth, sauing eich persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but be- lieued that Paradise was raised about the middle Region of the aire, and twentie cubits aboue all mountaines, that the flood did not therefore reach it : (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also be- lieued ; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it) : this is also contrarie to the ex- press letter of the Scripture : which directly, & without admitting of any distinc- tion teacheth vs, that the waters ouerflowed all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Malus Damasceus, and the Thalmu- dists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselves on the moun- taine Baris, and on Syon. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoole- men are) full of distinctions, saith ; that the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan ; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise saued by by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleued, that Paradise was so seated as Beda and others seeme to as- firme in wordes, but by Hyperbole and comparatiuely, for the delicacie and beautie fo- resembled. But this I dare aow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding wittie, yet they better teach all their followers to list, then to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tos- tatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Aitha, and Atlas, o- uer-reach and surmount all windes and cloudes, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the hilles both springs and fruits ; and the Pagan Priests, sacri- ficing on these mountaine tops, doe not finde the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence waite off by raines, when they returne : yet experience hath resolved vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinius himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the heighth of these mountaines is farre vnder the supposed place of Paradise, and on these selfe hilles the aire is so thinn (saith St. Augustine whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of aire to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Hose which come neare vnto reason finde Paradise vnder the Aequino- ctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus ; iudging that there- vnder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertilitie of soile : but against it Thomas Aquinas obiectioneth the disemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne ; but this is 30 (non causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be vnder the line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was ; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of disemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this : that whereas it appeared, that every Countie, as it lay by degrees nearer the Tropick, and so toward the Aequinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heate, It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Coun- tries which were situated directly vnder it, were of a disemper vninhabitable : but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought 40 that men habitable enough ; and though (perchance) in those dayes it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now finde, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and nearest to the line it selfe. For herof experience hath in- formed reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be discouered. Indeece it hath so pleased God to provide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such incon- ueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witness of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or 50 as a fruitlesse lump to falshon out the rest. For God himselfe (saith ISAIAH) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be in- habited. Now we finde that these hottest regions of the world, seated vnder the Aequinoctiall line, or neare it, are so refreshed with a daylie gale of Easterly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize, that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of

of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sunne can not so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or dis temperate beate found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh and equal, by reason of the entire interpolation of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seene, neere the Line and vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equal temper. Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high mountaines are barred from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees; which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest, and such difference of soyles wee finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those regions haue so many goodly riuers, fountaines, and little brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruites, euer bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit, both Greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts bee best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclotted and left naked, their sappe creepeth not vnder ground into the roote, fearing the iniurie of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despit her withered husband Verumnus, in his Winter quarters and old age. There fore are these Countries called Terra vitifera, Viti-ous Countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour, necessitie imposing no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruites then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not decciued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worke. And (to say the truth) all the Schoole-men were grosse in this particular.

§. I X.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Celestria, there is a Countrey in Babylon; once of this name as is proued out of Esa. 37. and Ezech. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginarie worlds, nor vnder Torrida Zona: it followeth that now we discouer and finde out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we finde that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians, (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extinguishe the Hebrewes. The Grazians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what hee could) to extinguishe in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiected and inthrall'd.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates & Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Countrey of Eden, we are to take for guides the two considerations: (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Iudea; and that it was of all other the most beautifull and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Countrey to Iudea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when hee wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such riuers, as are exprest to runne out of it: So as it followeth of necessitie, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, and the riuers onely described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isai I finde it coupled and accompanied with other adiacent Countries, in these wordes spoken in the person of Sennacherib by Rabshakeh, Haue the Gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telaasar: and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of HARAN and CANNES, and EDEN, the Merchants of SHEBA, ASHUR, and CHILMAD, were thy Merchants, &c.

But to auoide confusion, we must vnderstand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolis: the second part is that Valley called Auenia, otherwise Connathis, or the Tract of Chamath, where Assyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desert, and where Protonie placeth the Cittie of Aueria: and the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenia, or Celestria, otherwise Vallis canus, or the hollow Valley, because the Mountaines of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greeke is Cana in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lie East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Cittie therein called Paradise, the Jewes beleued this Celestria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise: though to giue Beroaldus his right, I conceiue that he ledde the way to Hopkins, and to all other latter writers, saying, that he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that hee altogether misvnderstood two of the foure Riuers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where hee wrote after hee had passed theredde Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isai and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAS) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaasar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Abur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Cittie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer beene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their merchandise to Babylon, and to those Citties vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the Cittie of Tyre, afterward to Tripolie, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Isscus, now Laisa. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euery Countrey yeelded: and hauing counted the seuerall people and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised. They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blew silke, and of brodered workes, fine linnen, corral and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kindes they traded, he hath these wordes. The Merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Faures, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all pretious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such spice, sweet gummes, and pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded, and (withall) hauing trade with their neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plentie of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Cittie of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Bassara) thence thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boate to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies journey of Aleppo, and then our land they pait to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripolie (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneb, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the riuier, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. St. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneb, Selencia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Selencus, who made thereof a magnificent Cittie. Hieroglymitanus thinkes it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneb cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be fourdable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the riuier of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: for these people of Canneb (afterward Schenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Cittie of Canneb in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as farre as the Cittie of Thapsacus, where Ptolomie appointed the Forde of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose wordes are these; Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam cunibus iter est per Schenitas, The Merchants which traueile from Syria to Selencia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneb for Charran doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the riuier of Chaboras, which filleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneb in Ezechiel (as they of Haran, and Canneb, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Albur, and Chilmad were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Arian fluuiorum, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Countrie betweene Riueres: for Mesos in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Cittie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that Tract of land from the borders of Calesyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batanea, and the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betwene Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneb lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, they of Haran, and Canneb, and Eden, &c. But St. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneb, or Chalne; for Selencia was anciently called Chalonne (witnesseth Appian;) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneb, to Chalonne: of which name there are two other Citties, standing in Triangle with Selencia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne; the one a little to the West of Selencia, and the other opposit vnto it, where these riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canneb was, (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is vncertaine: but it is a note aswell of the importance of the place, as of the certaine feate thereof, that so many other Citties did retaine a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlike, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canneb, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canneb, or betwene Canneb the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Citties by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the world.

Now

Now of the other Cittie ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, St. Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reuerterentur, perueniunt ad Jud. x. Charran, qua est in medio itinere contra Ninium, Undecimo die, when they returned, they came to Charran, (which is the mid-way against Ninine) the eleventh day.

This Cittie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest: Tecum, brethren, and fathers hearken: The God of glorie appeared to our father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the feate of this Cittie is not doubted of: for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but, with- all, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craffus the Roman, who for his vnassatiabie greedinesse was called Gorgus auaritie, the gulfe of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

With Roman blood th' Assyrian Carre he defild.

But this Cittie Canneb or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of Nimrod. *And the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and 20 Acad, and Chalne, in the land of Sinar, or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Citties and people were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neare it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countrie: which Region of Babylonia tooke name of the Tower Babel, and the Tower, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these wordes: And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plaine Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)*

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneb, in the first beginning of *Nimrod*s greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or farre-off nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneb ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: as and Esaie in the threats of Senacharib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Senacharib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaassar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe those other Countries, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth. Moroccoy 12. 40 the sonnes of Ham were Cush, &c. And the sonnes of Cush were Seba, and Hauilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the sonnes of Raamah were Seba, &c. and anon after Cush began Nimrod: so as Seba was the grand-child of Cush and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea-side and Persian Gulfe (called afterward Raamia and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonnes, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezechiel) the Merchants of Raamah and Seba were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Faies with the chief 50 of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Seba was that Tract of Countrie, which parteth Arabia deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrie Strabo calleth Catabaria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the

the East side of the Persian Gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Shebans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue bene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and pretious stones: of which they had not only plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromaticques and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES. In Persia ore initio insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi unioes gignantur: in alijs vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith STRABO) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian Gulfe there is an Island, in which there are many pretious pearles bred: and in other, very cleare and shining stones. Now the difference between Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is but this, 10 That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech,) and Sheba with (Schin;) in what soeuer the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographic, their Countries and habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that part which bordereth the Persian Sea; and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the redde Sea; and so that place of the 72. Psalm, expounded. Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Shebe & Saba.

The Shebans Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same riuier, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast and vpon it, past vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden which 20 Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Canneb, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrast, which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coremitena. (L) placed by exchange for (R:) which change the Hebrewes also often vse.

This much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacharib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar 30 lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyrrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacharib, many parts of the Babyloni- an Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly dilloyed.

For it appeareth both in Esaï the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabshakeh, the while the Armie of Affria lay before Hierusalem, that the Cities of Gofan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Affrians, though by them (in a sort) maiestered and recovered. Haue the Gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue deuiroyed, as Gofan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. But it appeared manifestly after Senacharib's death, that 45 these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Ezar-Haddon held Affria, and Meroдах Badan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Senacharib, commanded by Rabshakeh, which lay before Hierusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacharib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congregate the recouerie of his health, and his victorie obtained ouer the Affrians. After which overthrow Senacharib himselfe was slaine by his owne fons in the Temple of his Idols, Ezar-Haddon succeeding him in Affria. To the Babylonian Embassadors sent by Meroдах, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylonia afterward to undertake their conquest and subuersion. So as, the supulsion of 50 warre encreasing betwene Babylon and Affria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affria, were employed to beare off the incursions of the Affrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Affrians.

rians. This place Hieropolymitanus takes for Resem, others for Solencia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the Historie of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Persia) calleth Thilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a steepe and vnassailable Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garrison against the Affrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countre adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptoleme calleth Teridata, hauing Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand, and Canneb, 10 (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand, not far from whence is also found the Cittie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris, and all these seated together, as Esaï and Ezechiel haue sorted them. But the vnderstanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Affria & Mesopotamia in Babylonic nomen transiunt (saith NIGER) Affria and Mesopotamia sooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the world Eden is seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneb and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these wordes translateth this place: Plantauerat autem Iehouah Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith 20 he in his Annotations) Iusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabia & Mesopotamia, He commanded trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

p. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabite Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the yeare 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may haue some farther light for the prooue of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the 30 Riuier Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the Riuier of Eden. This Island as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozaria (as it were, the Island, by an eminence) It hath (saith he) tenne miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called this name be fallow- 40 ed vp, with the same of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Affria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath vp the Riuier, and not farre beyond it, the Cittie of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mofal or Mofel, from which (asin that which followeth it) shall appeare out of Masius) it is not about twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mofal or Mofel by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these wordes. Iuxta autem 50 Tigrim, Civitates sunt Dorbata prope Taurum montem, qua nunc Mofel dicitur, magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbata neare vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mofel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mofel, and making it to be Dorbata (I say) needes not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mofal (or Mozal) is in the confines of Mesopotamia and Affria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbour- hood hood of Ninive; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Neſtorian Chriſtians in their former epistle call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis que sunt circum Civitatem Moſal (hoc eſt) Attur in vicina Ninivæ; Of all the Cities and townes which are about the Citie of Moſal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Cteſphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Aſſur (which is the ſame as Attur, after the Dialect of thoſe Nations, which change Sh into T). Neither is it much that he ſhould miſtake Cteſphon (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Aſſur. By this then we may come ſomewhat neere the end of our purpoſe. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the breaſt of Tigriſ, is but twelve miles from Moſal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, 10 and the Scriptures (Ninive, Phileſtratus, and Simcon Sethi, Moſula, and Iohn Leon Moſal, others Moſſe, (though it be not the ſame with Moſal) is ſet but a little higher vpon the ſame river of Tigriſ, neere Moſal: ſo that we are like to finde this Ile of Eden heere about. For the ſame Andreas Maſius which placeth it about Moſal, makes it to be belowe Haſan-chepha, which is vpon the ſame river of Tigriſ.

The onely difficultie is this, that ſome perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Neſtorians in both their epistles ſpeak not of any Ile in Tigriſ, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigriſ, a river of Eden. But this ſenſe of their words in my opinion ſeemeth the more vnp probable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we have a teſtimonie from the learned of thoſe parts, that not onely Euphrates, but alſo Tigriſ was a river of Eden, and that the name of Eden in thoſe parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath beene ſubiect to the ſame change, that all other kingdomes of the world have beene, and hath by conqueſt, and corruption of other languages, receiv'd new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth our Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then of the tower of Babel, Babylonis; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mefopotamia, Aſſyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigriſ, betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region Eden that ancient Aethicus maketh mention, (not that latter Aethicus diſciple of Callinicus, otherwiſe by Plutarch and Athenæus called Iſtrius, who lived in Aegypt in the raigne of Philaſtratus, 30 but of another of a farre higher and remore time) the ſame being made Latine out of Greeke by S. Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient copie it be written in Aethicus Adonis, for Edenis, yet Adonis being a river of Phenicia, cannot be vnderſtood to be the region named by Aethicus. For Aethicus makes it a Countrey, and nota river, and ioyneth it with Mefopotamia and Aethiopia, calling the land of Chus Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And laſtly, the river which watereth the Regions (ſayth Aethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Perſia: which river he calleth Armodius, for Tigriſ; Tigriſ being but a name impoſed for the ſwiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigriſ and Euphrates have their originall: for out of Eden came a river, or rivers, to water the garden, both which rivers (to wit) Tigriſ and Euphrates come out of Armenia, and both of them traueſe Mefopotamia, Regions firſt of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitye. And it is very probable, that Eden contained alſo ſome part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitye thereof in diuers places is not unworthie the name of Eden. For in ſome part thereof (ſayth Strabo) the leaues are alwayes greene, and therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Alſo Stephanus de urbis mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vſe in Amos time, though he ſpeake not of Eden in the Eaſt, but of Eden in Caſſyria. But to the end I may not burden the readers patience with too long a diſcourſe, it may ſuffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigriſ (once ioyned together, and afterward ſeparate) are two of thoſe foure heads, into which theſe rivers which are ſayd to water the garden of Paradiſe, were diuided: whoſe courſes being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are ſayd to come) cannot be vnkowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigriſ and Euphrates it is agreed by all: for the ſcuentie and all others others conuert Perath by Euphrates, & Hiddekel Tigriſ omnes exponunt: and all men vnderſtand Hiddekel by Tigriſ (ſayth Vatable). And becauſe that which I have ſayd of the Ile of Eden, ſhall not be ſubiect to the cenſure of Miſinformation, I haue heere vnder ſet downe the words out of the two general epistles of the Neſtorians, as Maſius (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occaſion of thoſe letters and ſupplifications to the Pope were, that the Neſtorian Chriſtians which inhabit Mefopotamia, Aſſyria, Perſia, and Babylonia, and hae to this day (at leaſt in Queene Maries time they had) ſeuerall Churches in one Citie, called Seleucia Parthorum, or Moſel vpon the river of Tigriſ, hauing no ſufficient authority to chooſe themſelves 10 a Patriarch (which cannot be done without ſower or three Metropolitan Biſhops at leaſt ſent to the Biſhop of Rome in the year of Chriſt 1552 (as aforeſaid) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto ſuch an election as themſelves had made: hauing three hundred year before that vpon the like deſect, ſent one Marans thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they make knowne to the Biſhop of Rome the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in thoſe parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous deſire to enrich himſelf had forborne to inſtitute Metropolitan Biſhops, when the places fell void) they all aſſembled themſelves together to conſult of the Church-gouernment. And becauſe all the Patriarchs for 100 years had been of one houſe and familie to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Biſhop of the ſame ſtock and kindred, who aſpired to the ſame dignitie, which his Predeceſſours had held, the reſt of the Profeſſours reſuſed to allow him. Vpon which occaſion, and for the choiſe of a Governour more ſufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches aſſembled themſelves. The words of the general epistle to the Pope are theſe, about the middle of the ſayd epistle. Verum nos non acceptauimus neque proclamauimus ipſum, ſed ſubito conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis que ſunt circum Civitatem Moſel (hoc eſt) Attur, in vicina Ninivæ, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Inſula que eſt in medio Tigriſ, fluminis, Eden, ex Tauris Perſia, ex Niſibi, &c. which is, But we did neither accept of him, neither pronounc'd him: but ſuddenly we aſſembled our ſelves out of all parts of the Eaſt, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Moſel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninive, and out of Babylon, Charrha, Arbella, and out of the land which lyeth in the middle of Tigriſ, a river of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the river Tigriſ. And in a ſecond epistle at the ſame time ſent, they viſe theſe words: Neque ſuper ſunt apud nos Metropolitanæ, quorum eſt ordinare Catholicum, ſed ſoli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmaſi, Episcopus Adurbeigan, &c. veltigio conuenimus in Inſulam, que eſt intra Tigriſ flumen, Eden, ſecumque compatiunt inter nos &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Biſhops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Biſhops, as, the Biſhop of Arbela, the Biſhop of Salmaſus, and the Biſhop of Adurbeigan: but we aſſembled ſpecially in the land Eden, which 40 is in Tigriſ, and agreed betwene our ſelves &c.

Now this land of Eden Maſius deſcribeth with other places; which being well conceiv'd, the Neſtorian epistles, and the ſtate of the Church may be in thoſe parts (ſayth he) the better vnderſtood. And after he hath diſtinguiſhed the ſlower ſorts of Chriſtians in thoſe parts of the world, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Neſtorians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Cophis, he goeth on in theſe words: Mox audita illius morte, concurſiſſe aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tigriſ inſulam, que duodecim circiter paſſuum milibus ſupra Moſal poſita, decem ſerè millia poſſuum ſuo ambitu continet, muris vndiq, cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Chriſtianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch (as thoſe that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuouſly together into that land of Tigriſ or Eden before ſpoken of, which land is ſituated about 12 miles above Moſel, containing very neere ten miles in compaſſe, and euery where inſtrowed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men than Chriſtians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Chriſtian Churches; among the reſt he addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geſerta, Inſula Tigriſ: ſive Geſerta. Further-

Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hofan-cepia, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra predictam Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impositam, above the foresaid Island of Tigris, being seated on a steep rock. Of this Island of Geferta Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geferta ou Gessire est au milieu de la riuiniere du Tigre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie. Geferta or Gessire is in the middle of Tigris, the soile the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden lieth, and of that Eden, which lieth Eastward from Arabia Petrea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garifond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne riuers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

¶ XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure riuers to rise from one streame.

BVt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Riuers, in the Plurall, which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation (sayth he) hath these words: *Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvius procedebat ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium. Et inde diuidebatur. Et erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: which words (sayth Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a river was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was divided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuerts it thus: *Et fluvius egrediebatur de delicijs. And a River went out of pleasure in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis. And a River went out of the place of pleasure, and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countie of Eden, and not to the garden it selfe.

And for the word (riuers) for riuers, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written. Let the earth bud forth the bud of the hearbe, that seedeth seede, the fruitfull tree, &c. Heere the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, hearbe and tree for *hearb*s and *tree*s; and againe, we eat of the fruit of the tree, in stead of (trees): And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God. In medio ligni Paradisi, in the middle of the tree of the garden, for (trees). And of this opinion is David Kimbi, and Ratablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq, illorum, and he giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as A riuier (for riuers) went out of Eden.

And this answere out of diuers of the learned, may, not without good reason, be giuen to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one riuier, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (riuier) verse the tenth for one riuier (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuier, after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue beene, diuides it selfe, and ere long yeeldeth foure notable passages into seuerall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the riuier downward, there is conuoyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria, were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuier of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or waltheth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vseth this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malecha, (by interpretation) Basilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasitigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the land of Hamila or Susana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nahar-fares, or Narrigis, for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a riuier deriued) also Acracanus, quasi Ranofus, by reason of the froggie finnes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first ferte of Chusi, about the borders of Chaldaea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldaea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Basilius, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigris) about Selucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the Bodie of the Riuier Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otrus. But, be it a riuier, or riuers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (sayth Moses) Eastwards towards Assur, as we finde, that Tigris is the Riuier of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe Cittie was Ninive, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Ninive, which was the chiefe Cittie of Assyria.

And as for the kinde of speech here vfed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuers be (properly) their fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aque (sayth VLPRIANVS) illud est, vnde aque nascitur; si ex fonte nascitur fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a fountaine, then is the fountaine taken for the head: if out of a lake, then the lake; and if from a maine riuier any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new bankes, there is that part of the riuier, where the branch for, taketh the maine streame, called the head of the riuier.

¶ XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this region of Eden, by vs describ'd, be of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe, that the syle of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Vrbis Ninus sita erat, Hac regio, omnium quae nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward. Cereris autem fructu procerbo adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheate and Barley being almost four fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme-trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both meats, and wine, and a homnie, ordering them as the Fig-trees. Thus farre Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeeldeth bread, Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt, of which the people make bread, wine, homnie, and vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fifth commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeeldeth no plant comparable to this) those trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any trees of the field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) palmis per omnem regionem Palma sua sponte nascentes, There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report. Eunibus a parte leua Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam vberè & pingui solo, ut à pastu repellit pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat, (that is) As you trauell on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweet odours) there lyeth a champaigne Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are faine to drue their cattell from the pasture, lest they should perishe by satietie. Bis in anno segetes Babylonij fecant, The Babylonians cut their corne twice a year (saith Niger). And as Countreys generally are more fruitful to the Southward, then in the Northern parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of Armenia, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his wordes be these in the Latine, Tota enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq. semper virentibus, This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and trees alwaies greene: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbour hood, the life and stirrer vp of nature in a perpetual actiuite. In briefe so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their cornefields, and a third time to eate them vp with sheep: which husbandrie the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie years, could not make our kinde of Wheate beare seede, but it grew vp as high as the trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weedes (saith Plinie) who addeth this singulartie to that soile, That the second yeare the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeeldeth them a harvest of Corne without any further labour: his wordes are these: Ubertatis tanta sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitulis sat seget.

Plin. lib. viij. c. 17.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the land of Hauilah.

FTER the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two riuers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) hindeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both be that riuers or riuers of Eden, which water Paradise, which riuers or riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, then when we find both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discouered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these riuers were diuided into foure branches; and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probabilitie resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds to finde some partakers or sectatours; the better by their helpe to nurse and cherishe such weake babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the riuers of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush; and Hauilah in India from Hauilah the sonne of Iochan, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah and his sonnes after the flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Ramath; and the sonnes of Iochan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which later (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Iochan, that land of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous riuers of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which riuers is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous riuers after Tigris and Euphrates, they chose out this riuers to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is an other riuers, whome in these respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the riuers Indus on this side India, for beautie, for earnestness, and for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads: seeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris, and betwene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther toward the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betwene those two proud riuers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus bee not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse then fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely whosoever readeth the Storie of Alexander shall finde, that there is no riuers in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspes was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe; and the greatest part of his armie, and in saying downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed vp therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, hauing beides this, the Riuer of Coas, of Sinaitus, Acetines, Adris, (otherwise Hirotis) Hispalus, and Zaradrus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed vp with all their children and companions, which being all incorporate and made one streame, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15.

But because Pison, which compasseth Hauilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must somewhere beioyned with the rest in one bodie, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Countie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceed, out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the vtremost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the Riuer Ganges tiseth out of the mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucasus, which diuides the Northern Seythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gordiean mountaines, so as Ganges who onely traueleth in her owne India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, neuer law the land of Eden, or ioyned themselves in one Channell, either with themselves, or with either of the others; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or diuided into fower heads or branches, according to 20 Moses.

Gen. 2. 11, 12.

Therefore the Riuer Pison, which enricheth Hauilah, is the same which by ioyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piso-tigris, or Piso-gigris, of Pison and Tigris, which riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the sonne of Cush gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, so called of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilah of the Cushites hath also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a tree, of the bignesse of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine gumme, sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Berosus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth Pearle: so doth Eugubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing gumme, or pearle: Hauilah, or Susana hath plenty of both. Now this Countie of Susana or Hauilah stretcheth it selfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all that T raēt of land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre, according to Ezechiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Stench.
Hoyde Par.

The Greekes had a conceipt, that Pison was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-esra (sayth Hoptens) out of Rabbi Saadia tranlateth Pison into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellepont and all Asia the lesse, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pison which runneth through Hauilah or Susana, doth to this day retaine some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embrace each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioynēt and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange vnto me, that from so great antiquitie there should be found remanying any resembling found of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these riuers, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as, by Poitellus, by Caistalus, of Baldach: by Baris, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Theuet; and yet all those that haue lately seene it, call it Bagdet. To this riuer of Pison, Ptolomie indeed with many others giue the name of Basilus, or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-jares and Marsias, and Bar-jares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and fountain, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Iunius, Puckperath, out of the Hebrew, (that is) The profusion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omrya. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the ds: the Hebrewes Parath, (sayth Ar. Montanus;) Pagninus, Perath: Iosephus, Phorab; Eusebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalypticus: Gisilanus and Colinatus terme it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Assyrians know it by the name of Armalchar or Naher Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as, Diglito, and Diglat, Seilax, and Solax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genesis conceiueth rightly of these riuers: for Euphrates and Tigris (sayth he) streame into fower branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason, why these two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) looke their names, and are called Piso-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, linketh into the Lakes of Chaldea, not furre from Pr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison doth.

This error that Pison was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fields though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For 20 Epiphanius, Augutine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adioyning to Babylon on the side, and Cush (which is filly interpreted Ethiopia) fastned to it on the other side, wee shall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of riuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first face downe with his sonnes, Sheba, Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the sonnes of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison 30 compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush him selfe. For as the sonnes of ioctan, Ophir, and Hauilah, seated themselves as neare together as they could in India, so did the sonnes of Cush and Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chanilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Desarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalechites possesse all the interciunt Countries: for Saul smote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur the Chaldean Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the redde Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the redde Sea, to Hauilah in the East India, for Saul was no such traualer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah must 40 be found nearer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which Countie Saul wanted: for Amalek and the Amalechites posselt that necke of Countie, between the Persian Sea, and the redde Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South; and they spread themselves with the Madianites and Edomians, from the East part, or backe-side of the Holie Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best parts of Arabia Petraea, and Deserta.

Of the River Gehon and the land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Ethiopia for Cush. 2. Chron. 21. 16.

OW, as Haulah in the East India drew Pison so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Scuentie translated Ethiopia for Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latins followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopian are, as much as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countreie is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other regions of Ethiopian, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Egyptian Stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopian are very neare, or else directly under the Aequinoctiall line, which is very farre from that land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any fort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this Translation of the Septuagint. Pererius doth qualifie in this manner. There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopian in Africa, Pererius will make Chus and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia.

Now if it be graunted, that Cush and the land of the Chusites, be that Tract from Gen. 25. 18. Sur to Haulah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit Ismael ab Haulah usque Sur, que respicit Egyptum introeuntibus Affryis, Ismael dwelt from Haulah unto Sur, that is toward Egypt, as thou goest toward Affria; The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a river which watereth Cush, and not Ethiopia. But this place of Scripture Habitauit Ismael, &c. hath this sense. Ismael dwelt from Haulah, which is the way of Affria, or the Countreie bordering Affria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those regions betwene the border of Egypt and Affria. And that they were (according to the word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharabitha, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Assa King of Juda. Which Armie came not out of Ethiopia beyond Egypt; for that had bene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing fo mighty a King as the King of Egypt, betwene Palestina and Ethiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Assa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Cittie of the Ethiopian, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disproving it: And Abraham departed thence toward the South Countreie, and dwelt betwene Cadeh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar; Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feete after they passed the redde Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene weary, and vnable to resist. Again, in the Story of Isaac it is written. Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Ethiopian. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sidon was the Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazab towards the South. But indeede, how soeuer Pererius doth with an honest excuse: saue his Translation of Chus for Ethiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint. and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homer's East and West Ethiopia, they they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his first Booke and eighth Chapter, citheth Homer for an Author, of these two Ethiopia's. But the East Ethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prefter Iohn. And the West Ethiopia is that, which joyneth it selfe with the river Niger, which we call Senega and Gambria: for therabouts are these Ethiopian, called Pereris, Daraites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I mean that of Niger, and that of Prefter Iohn, and the Tragodytes) lie due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moses when he serued Pharao, in the warres against the Ethiopian: for in that (to make Chus, Ethiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Ethiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the worlds plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and laeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet Hieremie. And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith Pererius, profecto Hebraice tibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, que significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth black and troubleth water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Ethiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latin call a Madianite, and not Ethiopian, as (with Iosephus) the Geneu conuert it, though it helpe it a little with a marginal note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countreie of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from Pharao into the land of Madian, and sat downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro v. 2. his father in Law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these four Nations are eury where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalechites, and the Chusites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharao's steward. The Geneuans, in a marginal note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Cammells were laden with spicerie, and Balm, & Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the world is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid: And in the 39. Chapter it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldaean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the 6. of Judges. That when Israel had fowen, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalechites, &c. of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert, so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalechites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the storie of Geddon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites.

and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that every man would give him the golden ear-rings, which they had taken, after the victorie against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and cuer in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, et manus omni-um contra eum; his hand (saith GOD of ISRAEL) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schemita. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) use poison vpon their arrows, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites; and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Aethiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against IOHORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians; which confine the Aethiopian; so the same reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Aethiopians. Now, how farre it is off betweene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Aethiopians, every man that looketh in a Map, may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians, doe mixe and joyne with the land of the Chusites, and are distant from their next Neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betweene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue beene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against IOHORAM, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Aethiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; there remaineth no doubt (saith STEVCHVS) but Aethiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which lieth to Arabia.

Now may we thinke it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man so wel, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was cast vpon reeds, and preferred by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharae) a Riuer of Egypt, wherein hee was borne and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides the riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had beene a Riuer of Paradise, they might justly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all daies of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memorie, or speech thereof; except we shall beleue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Oliues in stead of golden apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Egypt, and once in the Prophet theremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a riuer of Aethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Aethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies, which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Machinites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and Heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Canaanites, with the Mogogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many so others: yea, Hiersusalem it selfe was with-held from Israell (from the daies of Moses euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stonie, which the Chusites inhabit ted in the times of the Kings of Israell: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Berouldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding), to create two riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I finde none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Riuers hee also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus: so where to finde them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginarie: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betweene it and the red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twenty English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israell stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere neighbours, and neuer looked back to the first scates and plantation of CHVS. For after the flood, CHVS and his children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. HAVILAH tooke the riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called HAVILAH, (now Susiana): Raamah and Sheba farther downe the riuer, in the entrance of Arabia felix. NIMROD seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. CHVS himselfe and his brother MIZRAIM first kept vpon Gehon, which felleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proceesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the red or Arabian Sea: from whence MIZRAIM past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remayned for many yeares after. Now because there could be no such riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Aethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that BRVTE, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Island after his name BRITANNIA, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a riuer, that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proceesse of time, the same BRVTE had also discouered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that EVROPA, the daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Hierodotus, and that the first discouersers thereof arriued in the mouth of some riuer in Crete, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discouered, shall we in like sort resolve, that France, Spain, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner it is layd by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole land of Chus; but not the whole land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue beene Maisters in time, (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in NIMROD the sonne of CHVS, consisted at the first but of fewer Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet we finde, that his Successors within a few yeares after commanded all the whole world in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by NIMROD a younger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father CHVS in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territories by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that CHVS or any of his could in haile creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130 yeares after the flood had (as it were) fortified with thickets, and permitted euery bush and briar, reede and tree to ioyne themselues (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the worlds plantation, we shall finde, that euery familie seated themselues as nere together as possible they could; and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselues, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduise, as that they might at a l times resort, and succour one another by riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So NIMROD, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, fate downe in the very confluence of all those riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of NOAHs children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankinde had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men ADAM, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankinde NOAH, began from thence his dispersion.

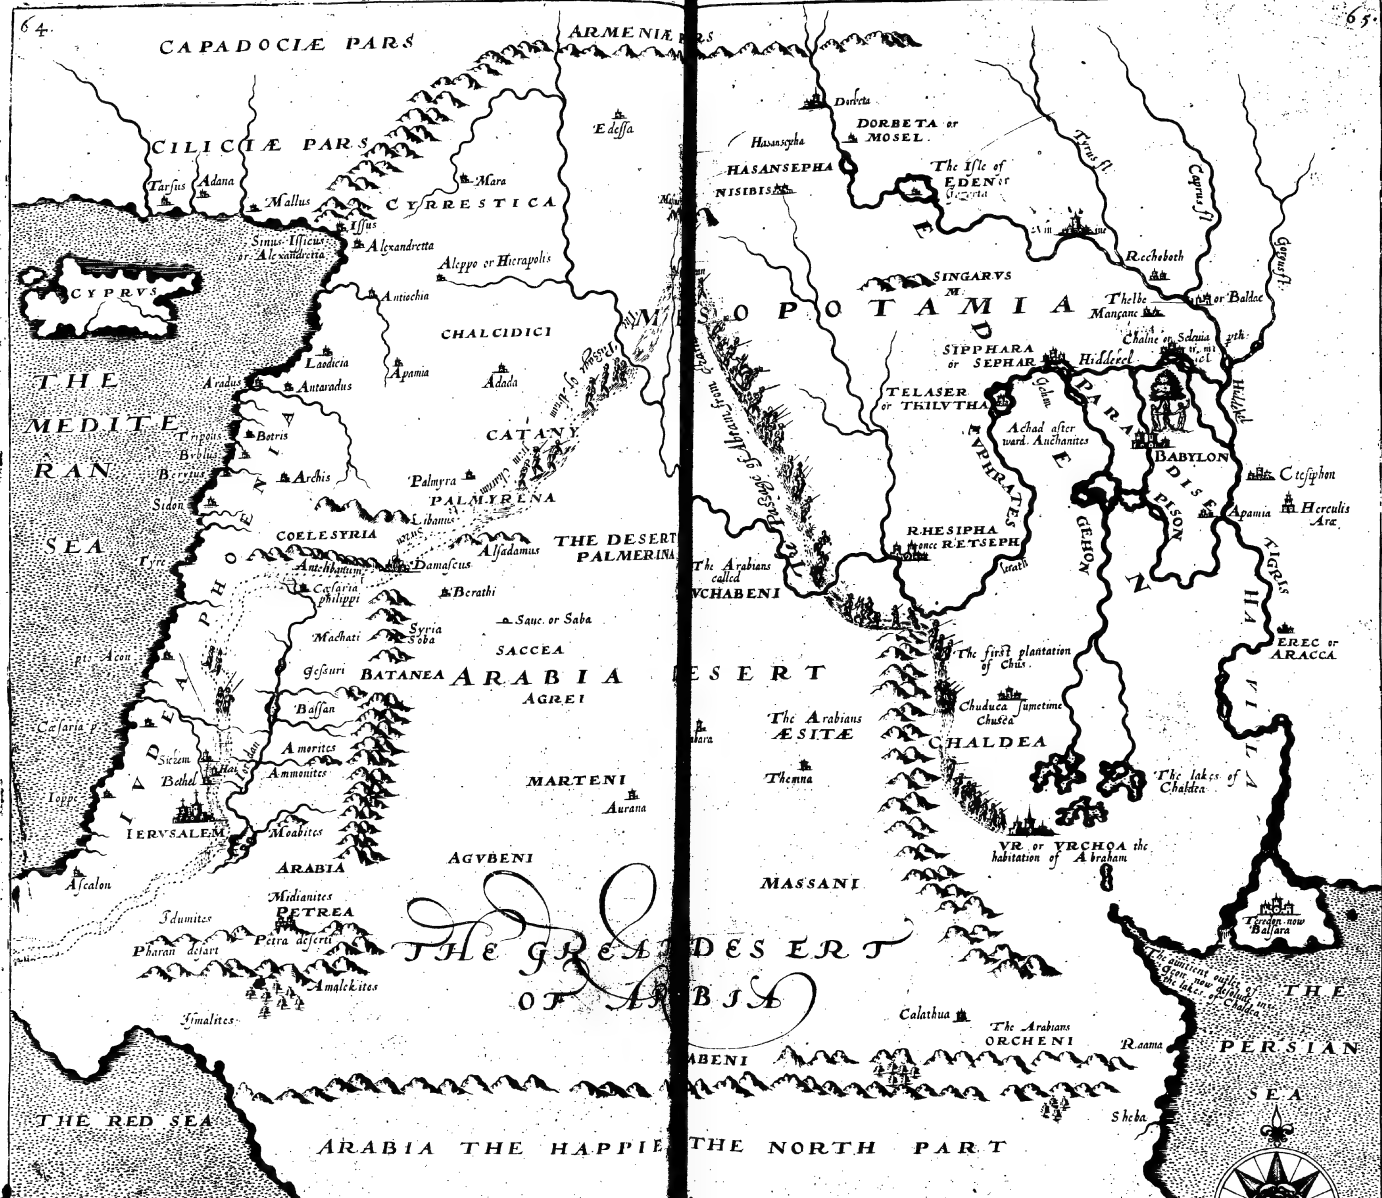

Now as NIMROD the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did HAVILAH place himselfe vpon Piso-tigris: RAAMAH and his sonne SHERA farther downe vpon the same riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: CHVS himselfe vpon Gchon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselues farther off, yet they alwaies fastened themselues to the riuers sides: for Ninieue, Charran, Reseph, Cannich, &c in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these nauigable riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

BVt now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our earth and habitable world, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluminum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35 degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55 from the North pole: in which Climate the most excellent wines, fruites, oyle, graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellencie of this sayd soile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein fouer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: this tree alone giueth vnto man what fouer his life bogeth at Natures hand. And though it may be sayd, that these trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countie is also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous thunders and lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous beasts and wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will be found no comparifon betwene the one and the other.

What other excellencies this garden of Paradise had, before God, (for mans ingratitude and crueltie, cursed the earth) we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular garden exceede all parts of the Vniuersall world, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow grow the trees, of Life, of Knowledge; Plants only proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne world: some, about the middle Région of the aire: some, eleuated neare the Moone: others, as farre South as the Line, or as farre North, as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the aire, and in mens fancies, vainely imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Indea, that God planted this garden, which Eden we finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we finde that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden doe ioine in one, and afterward taking wayes apart doe water Chus and Hauilah, according to Moses: the true seates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrarie: for that which was neuer ioined cannot be diuided. Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betweene Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the world; but Nilus is begotten in the mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauaileth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South; three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following I haue added a Choreographical description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labours may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time as this description of mine be reprinted by a better.

CHAP. IIIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

p. I.

That the tree of Life was a material tree : and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

OR eating the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradis, in exitum vite temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these trees of Life and Knowledge were material trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned writers : as nothing by the wis of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slippery, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also deliuered to the world an imaginarie doctrine.

The tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserve both the growing, sensitiue, and ratioll life of man; and not only (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a bodie compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the vnchanged law of God imposed on his creatures, Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngriued life : after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the flood, the daies of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the flood of two hundred years and upwards euen to hie hundred : so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandment, the liues of men on earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beliefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his posteritie had bene immortal. But such is the infinite wilddome of God, as he fore saw that the Earth could not haue contained mankind; or else, that Millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer : and therefore that of Chrysostome must be vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kinde or Species this tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach : in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not material, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercometh, to eat of the Tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place S<sup>t</sup>. Augustines answer may suffice, (whiche is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradis, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the maide and wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery tree faire to sight, and sweet to taste; the tree also of life in the midst of the garden : which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandment produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets : for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others steale the inuention of the created world; so from the Garden of Paradis, they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides : and from the tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the Gods.

p. II.

Of Becanus his opinion that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

OW for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, wherat Goropius much maruaileth. But as he had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely how soeuer his opinion may be valued, yet he vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Barcephus fastened on this coniecture aboute fixe hundred yeares before Becanus was borne; and Barcephus himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Authour Philoxenus Abahurgensis, and others, whose very wordes Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moses Barcephus in his Treatise of Paradis (the first Part and fol. 49.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, the Indian Fig-tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Acemes, one of the Riues which filleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies in, or neare the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great peaze, or (as Plinius reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree se semper serens, auides plantis in se; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troupe of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaues no lesse then a shield. Aristobulus affirmeth that fittie horsemen may shadow themselves vnder one of these trees. Onesivritus raiseth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinius and Onesivritus confirme: to the trunk of which these Authours giue such a magnitude as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a Plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the garden of Paradis to the Tree, and set it by the riuer Acemes. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner. After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foote in length, (some more, some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large topp, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme : for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummiue iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinnew, and within a few Moneths reacheth the ground; ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the toppe boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this corde maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these young trees there fall againe the like cordes, which in one yeare and selfe (in that world of a perpetuall spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the nether part of a launce, and as straight, as art or nature can make anything, casting such a shade, and making such a kinde of groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now one of these trees considered with all his young ones may (indeede) throwe foure hundred or foure thousand horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breed, intangled in their beddes, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene fise hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This tree (saith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to be.

Plin. l. 15. c. 5.
Lib. 1. c. 23.

Secondly, this tree hauing so huge a truncke (as the former Authours report, and Becanus beleue) it was in this tree that Adam and Eue hidde themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could containe them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the truncke or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane life. Secondly, the wordes of Moses translated in medio ligni, are by all the interpreters vnderstood in the plural number, (that is) in the midst of the trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-cephas, word for word) is, that when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeede) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame did not runne vp and downe the garden to secke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these wordes; Latitudo foliorum pelte effigiem Amazonie habet, The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Penthesilea furcis.*

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
Penthesilea leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be beleueed, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vling this confident (or rather chollerick) speech. Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hac à nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Mosis narratione comparat, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret, Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to auow, that any other tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith. But for my selfe, because I neither find this tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beleefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: only thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quàm ad conueniendum pure de simplici Obedientia bonum, Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obedience.

¶ III.

Of Becanus his not vniuersally allegorizing of the Storie of his Ficus Indica.

BVt in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few wordes. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man, grow straight and vpriight towards God, vntill such time as hee had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, hee beganne to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbraiousnesse of this tree hee compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, we haue all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to finde among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith he) to the little vertue, and vpercieued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate, so are the delights and pleasures of the world, most pleasing while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into chollic and bitternesse: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we secke for the fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest pease; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodnesse, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, bodie, and boughes of this tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meane: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becoming the vnwortheiest shrubbe, and humblest bryar, or the poorest and basest man, then such a flourishing statelynesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, fought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our sinnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practises in this world.

¶ IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the Storie of Adams sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the properties of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Innus also noteth, Arbor scientia boni & mali (ideſt) experientia boni & mali ab even- tu, The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanſhip of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created plant, out of whose ſeede all men liuing haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortali- tie from the breath or ſpirit of God, he could not (for theſe reſpects) be ignorant, that the diſobaying of Gods commandment was the fearfullſt euill, and the obser- uation of his precepts the happieſt good. But as men in perfect health doe (not- withſtanding) conceiue, that ſickeſſe is grieuous, and yet in no ſuch degree of tor- ment, as by the ſuffering and experience in themſelues they afterwards witneſſe: ſo was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the puniſhments, due to neglect and diſobedience; and yet felt by the prooffe thereof in himſelfe another terror then he had forethought, or could imagine. For looking into the glaſſe of his owne guiltie ſoule, he beheld therein the horreur of Gods iudgements, ſo as he then knew, he feel- ingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchaſed euill, which could not be expreſt. He then ſaw himſelfe naked both in bodie and minde; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and there- fore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not becauſe the fruit thereof had 25 any ſuch operation, by any ſelfe qualitie or effect: for the ſame phraſe is vſed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In ſuch ſort as this tree was called the tree of Know- ledge, by cauſe of the euent (as is aforeſaid) ſo was the Well of contention therefore called Eſek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, becauſe the Heardsmen of Iſaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of ſtones, called the heape of witneſſe, betwene Jacob and Laban, not that the ſtones bare witneſſe, but for a memorie of the couenant. So Jacob called the houſe of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Deſart, Vientis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and maiſtered by his affections, ambitious of a 30 farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himſelfe, and looking but ſlightly (as all his iſſues doe) into the miſeries and ſorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the ſup- poſed glorie which he might obtaine by taſting the fruit forbidden, he was transpor- ted and blowne forward by the gentle winde of pleaſing perſuaſions vnwares; his progreſſion being ſtrengthened by the ſubtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poiſon mankind in the very roote, which he moiſtened with the liquor of the ſame ambition, by which himſelfe periſhed for euer.

But what meanes did the Deuill finde out, or what instruments did his owne ſub- tile preſent him, as fitteſt and apteſt to worke this miſchiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; ſo as by Adams hearkening to the voice of his wife, contrarie 40 to the expreſſe commandment of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the ſubiect of labour, ſorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a Counſellour. But becauſe thou haſt obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (ſaid God himſelfe) Cursed is the earth for thy ſake, in ſor- row ſhalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is alſo to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the moſt vgly and vnworthy of all beaſts, into whom the Deuill entred and perſwaded.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her diſobedience: euen a deſire to know what was moſt vniſhing her knowledge, an affection which hath euer ſince remained in all the poſteritie of her Sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her perſuaſions? euen the ſame cauſe which hath moued all men ſince to the like conſent, namely an vnwillingneſſe to grieue her and make her ſadde, leaſt ſhe ſhould pine and be overcome with ſorrow. But if Adam in the ſtate of perfection, and Sa- 50 lomons the ſonne of Dauid Gods choſen ſervant, and himſelfe a man endued with the greateſt greateſt wiſedome, did both of them diſobay their Creatour, by the perſwaſion and for the loue they bare to a woman, it is not ſo wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in ſucceeding ages haue beene allured to ſo many inconuenient and wicked pra- ctices by the perſuaſions of their wiues, or other beloued Darlings, who couer ouer and ſhadow many malicious purpoſes with a counterſait paſſion of diſſimulate ſor- row and vnquietneſſe.

ADAM, and the flood of

§. I.

Of the cauſe and the reuenge of CAINS ſinne: and of his gaine win-from God.

HE ſame pride and ambition which begane in An- gels, and afterward poſſeſt Adam, Cain alſo inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his brothers prayer and ſacrifice) ſlew him, making himſelfe the firſt man-ſlayer, and his brother the firſt Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnatural murder, although it pleaſed God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his puniſhment was greater then he could beare. For the ſame offence chiefly (wherewith the ſonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) he deſtroyed all mankind, but Noah and his familie: for it is written.

The earth alſo was corrupt before God: of which in the ſame place Moses giueth a rea- ſon, for ſaith he, The earth was filled with crueltie: and anon after God himſelfe made the cauſe knowne vnto Noah, ſaying; An end of all fleſh is come before me, for the 40 earth is filled with crueltie through them, and behold, I will deſtroy them with the earth, or from the earth: Neither was this crueltie meant to haue bene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all ſorts of iniuriſſe and oppreſſion. After this murder of ABEL, Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord; and dwelt in the land of No- 50 towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden: in which wordes The going out of Cain from the pre- ſence of the Lord, is not to be vnderſtood after the literal ſenſe; God being wholly in all parts of the world. His word Nod or Naid St. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering, or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, faith Iunius; but the Seuentie conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Caïn was rather a vagabond or wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the murder committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And whoeuer findeth me (saith CAÏN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Caïn inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and we call those people wanderers and vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Caïn departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citty, and called it by the name of his first borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Caïn and Abel were figures of Christ 40 and of the Iewes; and that as Caïn, after that he had slaine Abel vniuilly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the world: so the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Commonweale, or Prince of their owne vpon the earth. Now this land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular people or Nation. For all these, in what part of the world soeuer, which in old time liued by pastorage, and fedde (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish: yea such were the inhabitants of Italie it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the husbandrie of tillage vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Affrye, called by Ptolomie, Calena, which also might be deriued of Carena, the Countrey of Caïn. And that Caïn inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written Gen. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Caïn also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitive, wee can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Caïn, then till hee built the Citty of Enoch, the first of the world, which he inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppress other thereby. So as for mine owne opinion I am resolu'd with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (vagabond) which Caïn vsed of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as traualleth in feare of reuengement: for whoeuer findeth me (saith CAÏN) shall slay me; or else (vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the Citty Enoch, were the first societic and ciuill assemblie of all other, it is likely that the same of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his sonnes; so that that after the flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and euery actiue minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Henoch stood before the flood, and whereof the monuments might remaine (as the pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occasion to the planters of that place to call themselves by the same names: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many mountaines, as those to which are otherwise called Coracici. And seeing that it is hard to finde out the truth of these things, which the most aged time hath couered ouer or defaced, wee may (according to the counsaile of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith faspise our selues, if of so great and almost worne-out antiquitie, if of the eldest peoples names, and nations there remaine any print or footsteps to posteritie.

In * Plinie, * P. Mela, * Strabo, * Valerius Flaccus, * Lucan, * Stephanus, we finde those Henochi described, though diuersly written, as in Plinie, sometimes Henochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochi, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East; they found a Plaine in the land of Shinar, but in this of Caïn he addeth the word (towards) as, in the land of Nod towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South, of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Enoch, the Citty of Caïn, or of the Region wherein it stood; when the same was repeopled after the flood: so it is probable that these Henochi of Colchis, and other parts adioyning, were 30 not the first of that name, after the sonnes of Noah beganne to fill the world againe; because, had this Henoch the Citty of Caïn stood in any of these parts, it had then bene seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Adengetin) 40 Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomie Zani; beyond which an hundred and fiftie mile Eastward he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these againe he discouereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountaines of Pardopansius, between them and the great river of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochi are due East from the Region of Eden; and Eastward from the very garden it selfe.

And although we cannot be assured, that these Henochi tooke name from the memorie of the Citty of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noahs sonnes did that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, than that of Iunius the Fryar, who sets Henoch in Phenicia, quite contrarie to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these euerrall Nations of the Henochi, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with diuers mountaines about Bactria and 50 Segdiana of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things selfe) out of the word (Henochi) which signifieth Carts or Coachmen, make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Cassir and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprise of Iason into Colchis. And though I do not denie, but that Iason with other Greekes ranged the coastes

§. III.

Of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAINS generation.

BVt of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Cittie of Enoch in prophane storie, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answere some few objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance then his sonne Enoch) to performe such a worke as the building of a Cittie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are firsit to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious race) Moses vscth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine reason, seeing that he containeth the whole storie of the first race, 20 which wasteth by the least account 1656. yeares, in fise short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leasure and meanes to build many such Citties as Enoch, be the capacite answering to what other of the world fouer: for in what age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of this issue Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a Cittie: so was it said of Noah, that his three sonnes peopled all the world; but in both the proccesse of time required to be vnderstood: which aduise seeing Moses vscth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee write the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the birth of Abel, and oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort; Fuit autem post dies multos or a fine dierum (that is) in proccesse of time it came to passe that CAIN brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased he built the Cittie of Enoch or Enoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that he built the Temple of Hiersusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon; that he employed in that worke 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King inuaded; when he caused an inualion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we finde, that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains issues, it is not to be marualed at, why he also passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his wife, who conceived and bare HENOCK, and he built a Cittie, and called the name of the Cittie after the name of his sonne HENOCK. And to HENOCK was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSAAEL, and METHVSAAEL LAMECH.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth ffire otherwise, and in this manner. And Seth lived 105. yeares, and begat ENOCH, and SETH lived after he begat ENOCH 807. yeares, and begat SONNES and DAUGHTERS: so as all the daies of SETH were 912. yeares, and he died: as for the yeares and times of the wicked they were not numbered, in libro vniuersitatis, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses ses walked in, and finished it with care, passing ouer the reprobate generation (as afore said.) Of the line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

¶ I. ADAM.

- |                                                        |                        |
|--------------------------------------------------------|------------------------|
| 2. Cain.                                        | 2. Seth.        |
| 3. Enoch.                                       | 3. Enosh.       |
| 4. Irada.                                       | 4. Cainan.      |
| 5. Mahuiel.                                     | 5. Mahaleel.    |
| 6. Mathusael.                                   | 6. Irada.       |
| 7. Lamech , who by Ada had               | 7. Henoch.      |
| 8. Tubal and Tubal , and by Silla | 8. Mathusalem.  |
| Tubalcain , and Neema.                   | 9. Lamech , and |
|                                                        | 10. Noah.       |

These be the generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech three score and fowerteen Sonnes and Daughters, by his two wiues Ada, and Silla: and to these three sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth 20 the inuention of Palkorage, of Musicke, and the working in metall; for it seemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into herds and droues: Tubal inuented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in bras and yron: the one being addicted to husbandrie, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Sheep-herds, handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the seruices of God, Divinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomic: the children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

§. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their children.

Second scruple hath bene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their children at so diuers ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuentie yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at three score and fise yeares, whereas Irada begat not any of his vntill he was 162. yeares old: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bene the more enforced, because it cannot be coniectured, that either Irada, Mathusalem, or Lamech abstained from marriage out of the religion of abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular sanctities, begat children before he was three score and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the generations before the flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the line of Noah from Seth and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Irada, nor Lamech the first borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might haue had many sonnes before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and furiuing, and which by God were referred to be 50 the Fathers of mankind after the flood; and therefore when we finde Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at three score and ten yeares who was the first sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeare of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah as afore said.

forefaid. Of this St. Auguftine hath fomewhat elfe in his 20. and 21. Chapters, De Cinitate Dei.

But as Mofes counted the generations of the firft age, and fo to Abraham, and the children of the promife after him, fo doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogie of Chrift, not by the eldeft fonnes, but from thofe whom God had choſen and bleſſed, without reſpect of the firft borne, who haue hereby the prerogative in Eftates, worldly and tranſitorie only; and therefore the Euangelift nameth Iſaac, and not Iſmael, though Iſmael were firſt in time: fo doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Eſau the elder; neither is Chrift deriued from any of the three eldeſt Patriarchs, Reuben, Simcon, or Leui, but from Iuda a fourth brother, and fo from Dauid a younger ſonne of Ieſus; 10 and laſtly we finde, that the Kingdom it ſelfe of Iuda was not giuen to the Heire in nature, but to the Heire of grace, namely Salomon.

¶ V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and ſome of late memorie.

He third obiection is, that the great difference of yeares betweene thoſe of the firſt age, whereof ſome of them had well neare ſene a thouſand yeares, makes it diſputable, whether the account of times were of the ſame meſure as in after-ages, ſeing that ſoone after the flood men liued not a third part of that time, and in ſucceeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

They that haue hereon reſolued that thoſe yeares were but Lunarie yeares, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are eaſily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enoſh in the year of his life 105, if thoſe yeares bee taken but for Moneths, then had Enoſh liued but eight yeares and one Moneth when he begat Enoſh; and if the time of Enoſh haue the ſame allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enoſh at that time haue bene but ſix yeares and fortie eight weekes old; and ſo it may be gathered of the reſt; excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kinde, as were the trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and ſeede. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of generation at 6. 7. or 8. yeares, agreeth with the ſhort liues of the Pigmies, and not with the conſtitutions of our firſt Fathers, who being deſcended from Adam, the workmanſhip of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the ſtrong youth of the world, had length of daies and abilitie of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeares, then there would follow this extremitie, that thoſe which liued longeſt, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of foure ſcore and ten and odde yeares, which were not only leſſe by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the flood, but ſhort of many mens liues in this decrepit age of the world, wherein many excede foure ſcore, and ſome hundred yeares. Further (if neede be) to diſproue this reckoning, whereas it is written Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunarie yeares) makes but ſeuentene and an halfe of our yeares.

And if we ſecke for a cauſe of this long life in nature, then is it reaſonable, that the firſt man, created in higheſt perfection, ſhould alſo beget children of equall ſtrength or little differing: for of the firſt and pureſt ſeede there muſt of neceſſitie ſpring vp the faireſt and fruitfullſt Plants. Secondly, the earth it ſelfe was then much leſſe corrupt, which yielded her increaſe, and brought forth fruit and foode for man, without any ſuch mixture of harmefull qualitie, as ſince that time the curſe of God for the crueltie of mans heart brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the flood infuſed ſuch an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Hearbes, and fruits vpon the earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of ſtrength, and another of weakeneſſe, a youth and beautie, and then age and deformitie: ſo Time it ſelfe (vnder the deathfull ſhade of whoſe wings all things decay and wither) hath waſted and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beaſts, and Plants; yea the Heauens themſelues being of a moſt pure and cleaſed matter ſhall waxe old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operative vertue from the ſuperiour.

But beſides the old age of the world, how ſure doth our education and ſimplicie of liuing differ from that old time? the tender bringing vp of children, firſt fedde and nourished with the milke of a ſtrange Dugge; an vnaturall curioſitie hauing taught all women (but the begger) to finde out Nurſes, which neceſſitie only ought to commend vnto them: The hallow marriages in tender yeares, wherein Nature being but yet greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her ſelfe hath not yet any roote ſufficient to maintaine her owne toppes; and ſuch halfe-ripe feedes (for the moſt part) in their growing vp wither in the budde, and waxe old euen in their infancie. But about all things the exceeding luxurioſitie of this gluttonous age, wherein we preſſe nature with ouerwaightie burdens, and finding her ſtrength defectiue we take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of ſtrong waters, hot ſpices, and prouoking ſauces; of which Lucan hath theſe elegant Verſes:

O prodigærum

Luxuries, nunquam paruo contenta paratu:

Et quaſitorum terra pelagoſq; ciborum

Ambitiſq; fames, & tanta gloria menſæ,

Diſcite quàm paruo liceat producere vitam:

Et quantum Natura petat.

Non auro myrrhæque bibunt: ſed gurgite puro.

Vita redit: ſatis eſt populus fluuijſq; Cereſq;.

O waſtfull Riot, neuer vvell content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of cates by land and ſea farre fetch and ſent;
Vaine glorie of a table ſumptuous,
Learne vvith how little life may be preferred.
In Gold and Myrrhe they neede not to carrouk;
But vvith the brooke the peoples thirſt is ſured:
Who fedde vvith bread and vvater are not ſterued.

The Egyptians affirme, that the longeſt time of mans life is a hundred yeares, becauſe the heart in a perfect bodie vvaxeth and groweth to ſtrength ſiftie yeares, and afterwards by the ſame degree deciaeth and vvithereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philoſophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares and Beroſus to a hundred and ſcouteen yeares. Theſe opinions Plinie repeateth and reprocheth, producing many examples to the contrarie. In the laſt taxation, number and renew of the eighth Region of Italie, there vvere found in the roll (ſaith Plinie) foure and ſiftie perſons of an hundred yeares of age: ſcuen and ſiftie of an hundred and ten; two, of an hundred and ſiue and twentie; foure, of an hundred and thirtie; as many that vvere hundred and ſiue and thirtie, or hundred and ſcuen and thirtie yeares old; and laſt of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and this ſearch was made in the times of Vepaſian the Father and the Sonne.

The ſimple diet and temperate life of the Eſſians gaue them long account of many yeares: ſo did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian ceremonies, to the Perſians, Arabians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nekuſtor liued three ages, and Tireſius ſixe, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the leſſe Aſia

denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the Iewes Cabals, or by what other means, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the heavens, and of the natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had scene and might preferue this booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath bene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses 19 came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the vndoubted word of God neede of any other prooffe then selfe-authoritie.

§. VII.

Of the men of renowne before the flood.

NOW let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publike. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creatour, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men beganne publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publike manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth to the time of Henoch the sonne of Iared there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more scene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah. NOAH was a iust and vpright man in his time, and NOAH walked with God. The Sequence conuert it, ENOCH placuit Deo: HENOCHE pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit eum Deus: scilicet, mortuus est, God tooke him away) that is, he died, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the pietie of Henoch and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he yseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not disloosed as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these wordes, And he died; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying only, he was missing, or he was not scene. Etenim inueniebatur (saith the Epistle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transiulit, And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

1. Cor. 15. 51.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kinde of changing, which St. Paul promisseth when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but all shall be changed, I leaue it to the learned Diuines.

Gen. 5. 29.

After Henoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our 50 hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his familie) preferred, because he was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and pollicie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in bodie and wit, there is no memorie remaining: whose Stories if they had bene preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the world, there could nothing of more delight haue bene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and vndertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner beginne to know, but we beginne to die; according to Hippocrates. 10 Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus praecepti, (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is Aspori heading. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses. These were mighty men, Gen. 5. 41 which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of bodie and crueltie of minde) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the pietie of Seth, and the waies wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, only 15 euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was nor only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersall, when the children and sonnes of God, (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous wiues, the Daughters of Cain, or 20 of those other men louing themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely Lactantius and Eusebius mislead by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and very needlesse: the question being vncapable of dispute; especially since St. Chrysostome and St. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrarie, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ 30 witnesse) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer forsake the glorious presence of their Creatour, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to nature and grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in latter times.

IF these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strained his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to looke time) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrius reproues the Gracian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly, That the Giants haue in elder times not only cast vp mountaines vpon mountaines, but remoued 50 Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembered; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the the Earth the daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassian (who hath written a wittie discourse of this subiect) thus changed into Latine.

Nomine caelestes illos dixere Gigantes Orit quod terræ fuerint & sanguine celi.

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heauen, they came,
Whome thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-belceuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to oppressours and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them oppressours because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppress, then say, That they were called Giants onely, because oppressours. For first Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vnder-taking and aduenturous action. And if the same stature of body, and abilitie had not bene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly hearkned to a dispute, and yeelded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will reserve to accompanie the Giants of Albion in the Storie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe clearly and without all allegorical construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Isaia, and of Dauid; namely the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Han, and of Emims, which dwelt anciently in the land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewise where Moses speaketh of the land of Ammon, he vseth these words. That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein aforetimes: and, whome the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouerthrew, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like stature, whome he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oakes; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bedde of yron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og King of Basan remained of the remnants of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdom of Basan, four hundred yeares after the expedition of Chedorlaomer. Morouer those discouersers and searchers of the Land of promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarre in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these wordes. All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our sights like grassie-hoppers, and so we were in their sight, (that is) the searchers found in their owne iudgements a meruallous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: in so much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slaueerie, then to fall by the strokes of those fearful Nations. Furthermore the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath was a Giant of sixe cubits and a spanne long: the armour which he wore waighed five thousand shickles of brasse: the shaft of his spear was like a weauers beame, and his speare head waighed fixe hundred shickles of yron. Also in Sammel there is mention of another Goliath surnamed Gethur, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauid Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure and twentie.

Also that Sampson was of surpassing strength no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had bene a Kidde; and after slew thirtie of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a jawbone of an Ass: And lastly he tooke the gates of Azazah, and the two posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the toppe of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approved by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of time hath (with it selfe) infiebled and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull then it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature and strength of those Giants remembered by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successours, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, soone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the buikes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the world: If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in crueltie and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his familie. And God repented him that he had made man, which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui panitit, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa presentia. Sed si non statim Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consilium: ut & perterreat superbie, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & dat intelligentes, God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men use to doe) but if the Scripture did not use those wordes or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stirre up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

HERE before we proceede any further, the occasion of-fereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, 10 and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mysticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those intermixt discourses of God and Nature for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of 20 the most healthfull hearbs and plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeker after God and Truth finde out euery where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the workes and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely exprest.

p. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient : as in the familie of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BUT this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euery) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of God being withdrawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the generall flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherit the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chal- deans beganne soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honour to the creature,

ture, which was only due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phanicians did not only learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall Gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, duodecim Deo- rum nomina primos Aegyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, cosq;
prius aras, & imagines, & templa dijs suis erexisse. The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue Gods, which the Greekes receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the Gods.

p. III.

That in proceesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater : as ap-peareth in the grosse superstitions of the Egyptians.

BUT as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euermore in vices vnknewe, and daylie trauaile towards their eternall perdition : so did these grosse and blinde Idolaters euery age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downewards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men only, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the minde, to Palenefie, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnwor-thy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie Rhodus Anaxandrides derideth in this manner.

Bonem colis, ego Deis mactō bonem.

Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas : ego

Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.

Carnes suillas tu canes, et gaudeo

Hijis maxime : canem colis, quem verbero

Edentem ubi deprehendo forte obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beeffe, which you adore.
I broile the Egyptian Eccles, which you (as God) implore:
You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.
You worship Dogs, to beate them I thinke meete,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I VVENAL.

Porrum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu :

O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis

Numina !

Sat. 15. 3. 9.

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to roote vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite :
O happie Nations, which of their owne sowing Haue store of Gods in euery garden growing.

§. II. III.

That from the reliques of ancient records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and fables were invented: and that the first IUPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TYBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certaintie, it was hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed or after what ancient patternne they erected their building, were it not certaine, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of what foucer was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or mettall remaining after the flood, and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings and date of times cannot be faied. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries with the rest which St. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many pro-phane Historians; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greekes, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the world was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Enochij before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275. chapter confirmeth. For besides that, many Cities were founded by diuers men, Tamen primam latissimam à primo et antiquissimo Ioue edificatam. yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IUPITER, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden &c. where also the Eno-chij were found after the flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an Incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phœnicians and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the flood.
Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he deliuereth in termes, in his third booke of Lawes: for hee saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great flood.

This first Iupiter, of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de urbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudeus conceiueh that Cain built fixe others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Iesca, Selet, and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the inuention of sacrifice: so were Iubal, Tubal, and Tubalcain (inuentors of pastorage, smiths-craft, and musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane writers Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name betwene Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noëma or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Penitha, or beautifull Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the diuiding Iupiter, Eua Rheia, and Noëma or Naamath the first Venus: so did the fable of the cucking of the world betwene the three brethren the sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true story of the diuiding of the earth betwene the three brethren the sonnes of Noah: so also was the fiction of those golden apples kept by a dragon taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eua: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the garden of the Hesperides: the prophecies, that

- 10 For although thereby the Ethnickes would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue faied, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is vissual among the ancient Poets to describe vertues and vices by the persons of men and women as desire by Cupid, valour by Mars, beautie or luit by Venus, so doe they also the persons of men by like vertues and vices; and therefore by Iustice and Astræa, Enoch: the Iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses for Noah was said to be a iust man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more scene: for God tooke him away.
- 20 From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remem-breth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whome Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great actes of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and againe their warre vnder taken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as St. Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants Cornelius Seuerus thus describeth.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe
And robbing IOVE of his Imperiall crowne
On conquered Heauens to lay their proude command.

- Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the Starres, should burie them vnder the moysture of a second flood, but that by this building (if they had bene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Æneides hath a touch, was as it seemeth borrowed from Moses, Exod.
24. Who when he read the Booke of the couenant sprinkled the people with blood, We finde also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men mistaking his time supposed) called his sonne and successeur Setho, of Seth, and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue graunted) were the Princes of Thraee called Scuthe, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whome they called a princi-pall Prouince Sethetica. We also find in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow, this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceeding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idoles which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V

Of the three chiefest IVPITERs; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those Armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their 10 originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Ether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire) the other discovered his naturall vertues, which daies and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Coelum or Heauen, for the same former respect, and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third of whom all the Græcian fables were deuiled, was of Crete (now Candia) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of stans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strayed. 20 Boccos in his genealogie of the Gods conceiue, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that starr had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions might be called there after Iupiter; but howsoeuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those titles and surnames: great Princes affecting as high titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoeuer deserued) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deseruings. Ioues omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERs as 30 TIZETTES in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Ioues vocarunt omnes: In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERs. But where this last and most remembred Iupiter was borne it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his vnde: because it was conditioned betwene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a yonger brother, and raigning (for his owne life) by *Titan*s permission, he should put to death all his male children, least the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is said that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine. 40

Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filij.*

SATVRNE to be the fatter is not knowne
By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betwene Titan and Saturne, Syllilla also witnesseth in these, Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit SATVRNUM, de se natum ne nutriat ullum, Quo possint regnare sensu post fata Nepotes. 50

Things thus agreed: TITAN made SATVRNE sweare
No Sonne to nourish; which by raigning might Vsurp the right of *TITAN*s lawfull Heire.

But

But Opis, the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conceived Iupiter (first called Lyfania) into Crete, as shee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where hee was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Island, by Cressa the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof. 246. in 1. temp.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that he was fed by honie-bees in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and skines into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many prettie tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the Father and the Sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerful fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after he was once sciled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliarize and adulterie, without all respect of honour, law, or religion. And it is reported by such, as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not only begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Iuno, but he rauished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niohe, Laodemia, and Alemena the wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Pelagius, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Sauona: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Castor & Pellux, Helen & Clytemnestra: by Danaë Perseus: by Jordana Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis, by Protegenia he had Abdulus the father of Endymion; and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the Founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Lybia, of whom that Countie tooke name, for so the Greekes afterward called Africa. He rauished Aegina, the daughter of Aesopus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Asacus: by Torthebia he had Archebius and Carbius: by Ora Colaxes: he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanum, afterward Ilium and Troy. Hee begat the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis Hiarbas. Hee had besides these (if they belieue not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inuents of Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that hee could not bee father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his seuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens 40 wiues, daughters and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showers of gold, Eagles, Buis, birds, and beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Græcian forgeries. And yet did not the Greekes and Romanes feare to entitle this monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second booke de natura Deorum affirme, that hee deserued nothing lesse, and in his Oration pro domo sua reproareth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith Lucian) Cretenses non solum natum apud se & sepulchrum Iouem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt. The Cretians or Candians doe not onely auow that IVPITER was borne and buried among them, but they shew his grave and sepulcher: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remained the monuments of his tombe in the mountaine Iafus. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended therat saith thus.

The Cretians euer liars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu' it away.

Diod. l. 2. c. 5.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Lybian fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek writers, that the original of these Gods was from the western parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Vranus (which significth heaven) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many wives 45. sonnes; but by his principall wife Tites he had 17. sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Tites likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a Goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Tites, her daughter Basilis (which name founding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in vertues as in yeeres, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being as yet a virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sun and Moone. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children moued her brethren to enuie, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne neck; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee 10 died, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that he and his sister by the prouidence of God should become immortal, that also the Sun and Moone should be called by their names, and that their death should be reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfe as a Goddesse, and tearmed her the great mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst they were yong. Hyperion and his race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Vranus diuided the kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the Countreys lying about the mountaines, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skillfull in Astrologie, 30 and for inuention of the Sphere said to haue supported Heauen. He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue bene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high hill in the midit of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue bene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleides tooke name. Saturne the brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italie. Iupiter another of the sonnes of Vranus, reigned in Crete; who had tenne sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that land after his wiues name Idea; in which he died, and was buried. But this Iupiter must not haue bene that great one, but vncle to the great Iupiter, if these fables of the Lybians were true. Saturne (as these Lybians tell the tale) was a great tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neere to the riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly for feare of his life to be brought vp at Nysa, an island in the riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certaine Nymphes. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly 50 Countrey, that lay on the Sea coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amaltheas plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, she fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon

Hammon

Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiters children before mentioned, held the land at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Crete the Kings daughter, whom he tooke to wife, and had with her (women as may seeme being very gracious in those times) the kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper yong man, had found out the making of wine, the art of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titanes; he leuied an Armie, to which the Amazons liuing not farr from 10 Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second expedition. In the second expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he wanne the loue of all the people by whom he passed; inso- much that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigorous gouernment, he was greatly strengthened, and the enimie as much enfeebled by daily reuoltes. Comming to the Cittie of Hammon, he wanne a battaile of Saturne, before the very wals: After which Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting 20 the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child Bacchus tooke with him in a great expedition that he made into the East countreys; and comming into Aegypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a boy, gouernour of the Countrey; but appointed vnto him as an Ouerseer, one Olympus, of whom Iupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilst Bacchus traualled through all nations, as far as into India, dooing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India; with whom Iupiter from Aegypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest that afterwards were held 30 as Gods, ioining all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chafed them, tooke, and slew them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter the sonne of Saturne succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Lybian Gods, and the Aegyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked images of some one true historie. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the kingdome of Aegypt giuen by Hercules Lybius to Orus, by Bacchus to Iupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Basilis, with many pettie circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoiatio (as Engelbius cites him) would haue all these to be Phenicians, 40 and is earnest in saying; that it is a true storie, and no Allegorie. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Vranus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the genealogie he addes Elus or the Sun, as father of Vranus; and among the children of Vranus, Tapetus, Betulus, and Dagon, (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Vranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Ilus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Crete, The Pedegree of them is this.

§. VI.

of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

F Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonius, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered : for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Noxram, Iupiter Chamman, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sandes, is ridiculous (saith Pencer) ; neither yet is his owne much better, Pencer de G.

better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate : because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Lybia, where the ayre is exceeding hote and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was borne not long before the war of Troy, as by many of his sonnes is made manifest ; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen ; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others sought to be numbered among them, who were as deformed monstres as the rest : For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus ; seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

B Ut that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (ouer busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures : for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in Hell, where hee faired that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the bookes of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare ; of which Iustine Martyr remembereth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things, for feare of the inquisition of the Acrepagites, yet St Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembered) Et mirifice ijs delectatus est, quæ de vno Deo tradita fuerant, And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoeuer Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and the bookes of Moses : Eusebius, Cyrrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleue the contrarie, thinking that from thence he tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie : and the same opinion had St Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possesse all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures ; or fearing the seueritie of the Acrepagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poison, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's feare, whose wordes among many other of the same effect, are these ; PLATO MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod vnum solumq; Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putauit, veritus Acrepagum. PLATO fearing the Acrepagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of MOSES, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in TIMEO ; id ipsam de Deo disseruit quod & MOSES, he discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr) which MOSES did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answer MOSES, Ego sum exciens (which is) I am ; and exciens misit me ad vos. I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that Moses vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod : MOSES enim qui exciuit (inquit) PLATO quod exciuit. For MOSES saith, He who is ; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, he he giue this testimonie: Genitorum Vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile digne profari, it is as hard to finde out the Creator of the Vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maieſtie of Gods nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa, God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum, The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things.

De Legib. 1. 10.

Apuleius the Platonist. Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione sed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfectio bonus, The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient, quia nunquam esse cepit, because hee neuer had any beginning: Zeno, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men: Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was eury where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the creation, then this opinion and description of the worldes beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Lactius.

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when disioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we finde the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who eury where exprest the infinite and sole power of one God, though hee vse the name of Jupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; but that he could attribute those things to the Sonnes of men and mortal creatures, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Æmina Deorum (saith Mirandula) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipitium demonum, a quibus malum & non bonum promenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina, The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Demits, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of natural and diuine vertues. Yea that he yet reacheth higher, and speake of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs. Respicens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

The first of all is God, and the last is he.
God is the head and midle, yea from him all things be;
God is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is God, the Sunne, the Moone, and what is higher,
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holie brest he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Ægyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugenius, Peucer, Pleſtus, Danæus, and others. For Cleantes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties. Bonus, iustus, sanctus, seipsum possident, citilis, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, possessing himselfe, praisable, beautifull, best, seuer, free, alwaies doing good, safe without feare, glorious, and selfe-charitie. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was only and euery where powerfull: agreeing with Democritus. Rex omnium ipse solus, He is the only King of all Kings; and with Pindarus the Poet; Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos secundum merita præbet, One God, the Father, the most high creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not else where knowne, Nisi in patria perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes, Sæue only in that euerlasting countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIUS.

30

Vnus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis, There is one God among Gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals; and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq; quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui lucē suā omnia perfruat, God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum naturæ causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sopiator, æstidus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore villo comprehensus, cogitabilis, nemini effabilis, God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternal preseruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can expresse what he is.

Therefore was it said by St. Hierome, Si enim cum tot Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem visorum Dei, ut apud PLATONEM, fabricator em mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferas & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the creatour of the world: in ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, liell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisdom of all ages, wee shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are fober, and by a peniue inspection aduised; but that he hath found by an vnrerifiable necessitie, one true God, and euertlasting being, all for euer causing, and all for euer sustaining, which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, then that egyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it failed afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuillish pollicie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new Gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wayes were as length about the same time vnder IVLIAN miraculously confounded.

BUt all these are againe vanished: for the inventions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fewell staueth, water queneth, and want of aire suffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with *Iuno*s ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the bodies and images of him and his: yea, their starely Temples of stone and duredull Marble: The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where bee found vpon the earth; nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phoenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter: The great God Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuils telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfait Egyptians, and censuring Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouerthrowes and disho-nours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delfos (one of his chiefe Manions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and ornaments therein by the Eubean Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vtterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrhus the Sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phoenes: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoeuer was gathered betwene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vtterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The

The like successe had the Jewes in the same Julian time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by tempest and thundr: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Jewes, ascribing this to the nature of that element.
For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudea, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming balls of fire issuing neare the foundation, and oft consuming the workemen, made the enterprise frustrate.

§. IX.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOw the Deuill, because he cannot play vpon the open stage of this world (as in those dayes) and being fill as industrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effec-tuall adoration of himselfe then euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of beasts, birds, and other mixt Natures; hee now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the all-commanding Image of bright Gold. Hee tels them that Truth is the God-desse of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of nature; and lastly, that as all vertue (in general) is without taste: so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician finde in his Pupils any remorse; any feare or feeling of Gods future iudgement, hee perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeouours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged pouertie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouergrowne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one we finde our sufferings and patience, to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious then euer: the long day of mankinde drawing fast towards an euening, and the worlds Tragedie and time neare at an end.

CHAP. VII.
Of NOAH'S Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning : and some humane testimonies : and some doubting touching the truth of NOAH'S Flood.

Joseph. l. 1. c. 4.

F this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit;
He departed with his children, and traualled into another Region. And of these Giants writeth in this manner, That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnatural wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum, contempters of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berofus) vnus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huius nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphet, and Cham, and with their wiues, and the wife of Noah, (namely Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preferred themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said vnto NOAH, make thee an Arke of pine trees: thou shalt make cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without, with pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebbeli-ous and cruell generations were already fashioned in the cloudes, which foone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the aire: Noah and his familie excepted.

Euseb. de prep.
l. 9. c. 4.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall deluge hath not bene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: dam oboluta in obscura veritate latet, whilst the truth lyeth wrapped up in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this flood of Noah fell but on some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue bene many other floudes (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his wordes are cited by Iosephus.
Eit super Minyadum excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos con-fuentes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuictum in huius vertice hessisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Iudaeorum Legislator scribit: thus saith this Authour. There is (saith he) about Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither were saued in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the toppe of the mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certaine peeces thereof; and this might be the same, of which MOSES the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalrudists (saith Annus) that many Giants saued themselves vpon Mount Syon.

But Berofus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoever hee haue bene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall flood, taking from thence the beginning of his Historie in these these wordes. Antequaquum cladem famosam, qua vniuersus perijt Orbis &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three sonnes with their wiues (in all eight persons) were onely saued.

§. II.

Of the flood in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAH'S flood.

Vt from the vanity of the Greekes, the corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the world, that there was no flood preceded the flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Boeotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore saith Rhodoginus Ogygium id appellat Poete, tanquam peruenit dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustissimo. The Poets gaue the name of OGYGIA to things exceeding ancient, as of OGYGES the most ancient.

Rho. li. 15. c. 33.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he lived but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeares after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he saide later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth booke of his antiquities rememb'reth: sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autem hunc: unde sit CADMVS qui in Graeciam profectus Thebas condidit, aboue ingulate sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syra- rum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith hee) who thinke that this OGYGES did raigne in Aegypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who traueling into Greece built Thebes,

Ca. 33.

But this flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the world 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the flood of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. yeares betwene these floods, wanting but two, though heerein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very year and time of this ouerflowing in Achaea, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among writers, yet whosoever makes it most ancient, findes about 500. yeares difference betwene that and the generall flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians but 1040.
yeares before Rome built. Bucholzerus saith it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds year 3219: though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the storie of 40 Abraham) it was built in the worlds year 3280. Now the generall flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeares: and the flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by calic calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betwene these two floods must be 520. yeares, to which we allowing 60. more finde 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah Ogyges prius, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the flood of Ogyges then king of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archipelago, or the Aegaeon Sea. For whereas Melas, Plinie, and Solinus witnesse, that the Citie of Ioppe in Iudaea was founded before the flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of waters) there remained on certaine Altars 50 of stone the title of the King, and of his brother Phineus, with many of the groundes of their religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the flood of Ogyges spread it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it fec-

Of this flood of Ogyges was invented the fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona the daughter of Caeus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with childe, Iuno thereat enraged permitted her (as they say) no part of the earth to be deliuered on; and withall caused the monstrous serpent Python to follow and affright her, wherefoeuer she trauiiled, till at length arriving at the Ile of Ortygia she was there receiued: in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twinned; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the deluge (which happened in Ogyges his raigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the earth (beat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Aegean sea, neither the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night could pierce the ayer, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayer began to be cleare, and the people of Ortygia elyped the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortygia thereof afterwarde called Delos: which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayer sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusual face of the skies. Varro in his bookes De gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augusline) reporteth out of Cassor, that so great a miracle happened in the starre of Venus, as neuer was scene before, nor in after times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read, of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or else where in those daies as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should neede no reformation. Of the colour and magnitudo. I see no reason why the difference found in the starre of Venus should be held miraculous; considering that lesser mists and fogges, than those which couered Greece with so long darkness doe familiarly present our senses, with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should vary, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet, would vnto our eyes, decrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

Galileus, Galileus, a worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective glasses hath found in the starres many things vnkowne to the ancients, affirmeth so much to haue beene discovered in Venus by his late obseruations. Whether some waterie disposition of the aire might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges as Galileus hath scene through his instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discourse courcie of a truth formerly vnkowne, doth rather conuince man of ignorance, then nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of S. Augusline) accompanied with such vnusual (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturally) signes testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the flood of Noah which was generall and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or foretelling, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the flood came sodainly, and rooke them all away.

§. III.

Of DEVCALIONS flood: and that this was not NOAHs flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vnioerfull flood.

Second flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia, of which S. Augusline out of Varro. Hist. temporibus (ut VARRO scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CRANAOS, (successore CECROPIS (ut autem nostri, EVSEBIUS & HIERONYMUS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum est Deucalionis: (that is) In these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANVS the successor of CECROPIS governing the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIUS and HIEROME say) CECROPIS yet liuing, that flood (called Deucalions) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he vseth these wordes. Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiuos TRIOPAS. MOSES led the people of God out of Aegypt about the latter times of CECROPIS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES reigning ouer the Assyrians, ouer the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and ouer the Argiuos

TRIOPAS: so as leauing the curiositie of a few yeares, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this flood of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Aegypt, or neare it: and then after Noah 753. yeares, according to Funifius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeare of the world 2400. or if we follow Alerator, then 739. yeares after Noah, and in the yeare of the world 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the world 2356. according to Cadoman; then giuing vnto Deucalion fourtie yeares of age when this flood happened, it fillth within one yeare of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historians is said to haue bene 82. yeares old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaeton time, by the reaigne of

Cratops King of the Argiuos; but Cratops liued King of the Argiuos fixe yeares after Israel departed Aegypt, which makes twentie yeares difference according to Funifius, who will haue this flood and burning to haue fallen fourteen yeares before Moses left Aegypt: for hee gaue of the worldes yeares to the flood and burning the year 2440. and to Moses his egression the year 2454. And yet Celestius thinks that Noahs was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessalia (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeares or thereabouts. Evsebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Evsebius about the 50. yeare of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs flood 770. yeares: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his wordes. Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM, inundatio qua fuit tempore Ogygis. There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the flood of Ogyges. Now if the flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeares before the first Olympiad, according

according to Enfeli and Orogus; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763 out of this number of 1020. it falls out that Ogyges flood happened before the Hebrews left Aegypt 250. yeares, or 260. yeares, according to the difference between the opinions of Enfeli and Orogus. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeares more to Abraham after the flood, then the rest) I reckon the times which come betweene these floods in this sort. The generall flood was in the year of the world 1656. Jacob was borne in the year of the world 2169. so as from the beginning of the flood to Jacob's birth there were consumed 513. yeares. Ogyges flood happened 100. yeares after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall flood 613. yeares. Now Deucalion was borne in the year of the world 2356. and had liued 82. yeares, when his Kingdome of Theffalie was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438) his flood was after Noah's flood ended 782. yeares. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700 yeares betweene the generall flood and Deucalion's birth; to which adde 82. yeares of his age (as before) and then the flood of Theffalie followed the generall 782. yeares. The wordes of that Xenophon are these. *Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEUCALIONIS, secundo anno Sphari, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theffaliam vidit inundatam. From the drowning of the world to the birth of DEUCALION, in the second yeare of Spharus, are numbered 700. yeares, and when DEUCALION was 82. yeares old, he saw Theffalia drowned. This flood happened in the winter time about Panassus: witnesseth Aristotile in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom St. Augustine to often citeth for his excellent learning, especially in antiquities) findeth this flood of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orogus thinkes it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only our Theffalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward; but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and either the same, or some other particular flood then happening oppressed Aegypt, saith Enfeli. And therefore did the Greekes either thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion, then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the mountains of Theffalie (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preseruer of mankind. That this flood couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable: who affirme that the people then inhabiting Italie were therefore called gigantes: quia ab imbris diluuij superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Tzetzenus in his second: which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to bee the Parents of the Samites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the inhabitants of Italie before the flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselves vpon the Appenine mountains, the Scriptures teach vs: shewing who, and who only then were preserued, which is sufficient. Report hath aduentured further, telling vs that the first people which after the generall flood inhabited Italie, were the Cameleses: (so named from Camele, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annius his Authors names for a comfort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life; till such time as Saturne arriuing on those coasts, desired lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose acts in that Region Diodor and Thalys among the Greekes, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latines haue perserued; and of whom Virgil:*

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Aufones, and after them of the Sciani: Nations, which againe fought to displant the ancient inhabitants:

Tum manus Aufonia, &amp; gentes venere Sicani.

Virg. l. 8. Æn.

Then came th' Aufonian bands, and the Sicanian tribes.

Of these Sciani (which left Spaine and sate downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligy, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Galles (saith Annius) not of those Galles of France, but of those of Seythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Hetruria and Campania, as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius, haue assured vs; and therefore this flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossest of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camelesene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Aufonia, then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions flood happened) possesst the same, about 306. yeares before the war of Troy: Lycaon then gouerning Arcaidia; who being the Father of two and twentie Sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held untill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italica, after his owne name, about 250. yeares before the fall of Troy. After these came the Pelasgi, of whome Plinie in his third Booke and fift Chapter; and Strabo in his fift; Thucydides in his sixth speakes at large: and after them the Lydi vnder Tyrrhenus their Captaine, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who calling thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had possesst and past ouer the Appenine Mountains) they added diuers others, whercof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme: hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinkes, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Seythians (called Galli) it shall bee shewed hereafter.

§. IIII.

Of some other records testifying the vniuersall flood: and of two ancient deluges in Aegypt: and of some elsewhere.

Aint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuersall flood, because they had nothing of antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of decayed date. But as all the parts of the earth were successfullie planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euerie familie which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of diuine

uine letters was not receiued, finde no parent of more antiquitie, then such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Græcians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigenes, and growing out of the earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Zacharias Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saued themselves vpon the mountains Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approved: vling the word Sermo est, that such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus to preserue himselfe from a flood foretold him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birdes feete were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius wordes out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs flood.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Græcian inundations. Fryer Annus his Xenophon remembreth 20 a third flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall flood: for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, sub prisca Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Promethæus then liuing, 44. yeares before that of Attica, in the 34. yeare of Belobus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleuee him as touching the time. But this flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Promethæus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Promethæus his liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these wordes: Flanum propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatem, aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, HERCVLEM cum consilij magnitudine, 30 *tum virtute, volunt e vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuertisse: Vnde & Græci quidam Poetæ rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCVLEM bradant Aquilam PROMETHÆI jecur deprecantem occidisse, This flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCVLES by his great indgement and vertue did againe compress, and straighten this River, so farre extended and ouerspread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Greeke Poets (converting this labour and worke of HERCVLES into a fable) denised that HERCVLES slew the Eagle, which sed on PROMETHÆUS liuer; meaning that he deliuered Promethæus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his people and Countrey (by the waters destroyed and couered ouer) hee 40 suffered.*

A fourth flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annus conceiuerth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort-witeth of all these inundations. Inundationes plures fuisse: prima nouissime inunda- 10 *to terrarum sub prisca Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many inundations (saith this same Xenophon) the first which was vniuersall of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance in the time of Hercules and Promethæus Ægyptians: a third of two Moneths vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths in Thessalia vnder Deucalion; and a fift of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Ægypt, about the time of Helms rape. Diodorus in his fift booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samothracæ for his*

But there have beene many floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeare of our redemption 590. when in October of the same yeare, Gregorie then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruailous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Venetian territorie, and in Lycuria, accompanied with a most fearful storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the land, after the waters decreased and returned. And in the yeare 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Seas at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kinde I take that flood to be of Achæia 10 or Attica. Before that and in the yeare 1238. Tritheimius speaketh of an earthquake which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a flood in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicilie were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the yeare 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. Hee also remembreth a perillous ouerflowing in Polonia, about Cracouia, by which many people perished. Likewise Vigimier a French Historian speaketh of a great flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeare of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attend therein the very end of the world, and iudgement day; saying, that by the violent descent of the waters from the mountaines, about Nismes there were removed diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both coyne of siluer and gold, diuers peces of plate, and vessels of other metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Prouince, in the yeare 1156.

§. V.
That the flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foretold by the Starres.

30 NOW howsoeuer all these floods and many other, which haue couered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the world, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southfayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the earth by a power aboue nature, and by the especial commandment of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaines of the deepe: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountaine of all power, 40 strength, and faculties supernaturall. Henricus Mecliniensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Albus Masar obserueth, that before the flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the ship of Arges; by which the flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a waterie signe, and the house of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming that although Noah did well know this flood by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further that by * Cataractæ a celi (Englished the windores of 50 properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carried downwards, dashed and breakech: of apertæ alio or frange. Hence, because windores doe not only open but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windores) to be barres or flood gates.

heauen)

heauen) Moses meant this great and waterie coniunction; the word (Cataracta) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordeaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked waies wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercie.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood that the wordes Cataracta cali, or windores of heauen were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these waterie signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion, and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest inundations. His owne wordes are these, Non enim intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum cataractas 10 cali vocasse, nisi partes illas cali, quæ generatiue sunt pluviarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by those words: (Cataracta cali, or windores of Heauen) vnlesse he thereby vnderstand those celestiaall powers, by whose influences are engendered the raine, and inundations of waters, such as are the waterie Signes of Cancer &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable wisdom this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigour and facultie, and gaue to euery operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and fountaines, commanding them to call out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Cloudes, and condensing ayer into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no neede of any new creation of matter to make the vniuersall floud: and what are Cataracta Cali.

Gen. 7. vers. 11.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which gaunted, it may seeme that then all the earth & ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable world fiftene cubites about the highest mountaines. Of this proposition whether God hath so restrained himselfe or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the world had want of water to ouercoer the highest mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish; for it is written, that the fountaines of the great deepe were broken vp (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the earth; and all whatsoeuer was disperst therein peired and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider that the Earth had about one and twentie thousand miles: the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest mountaine of the world, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountaines of Armenia or Seybia, or that (of all other the highest) in Teneris, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest stretcheth about thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the earth one hundred and sixteene times: for the fountaines of the great Deepe were broken vp, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the earth. Secondly if we consider what proportion the earth beareth to the extension of the ayre ouer and about it, we shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased fed God to condense but so much of this ayre as euery-where compasseth and embraceth the earth, which condensation is a conuersion of ayer into water, a change familiar in those elements, it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with waters without any new Creation.

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacenſis, to which I may adde Berosus and others, That such a coniunction there was, foretelling that destruction by waters which followed; and that by the word Cataracta cali, or Windores of heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needes no other answer then that obseruation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth that by the graueſt Astrologians it was obserued, that in the year 1524. there should happen the like coniunction, as at Noahs floud, then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable year: the like destruction was prophesied of the year 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth that there could not bee any such coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I finde no other mysterie in the word Cataracta cali, then that the cloudes were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that bee the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the raines, and pouring downe of waters. For whosoever hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts (where cloudes doe not brake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the windores or floud-gates of heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell, contrarie to custome, and that order which we call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost aire, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith Ios) he which holdeth the waters, and they dried vp, or better in Latine, Et omnia sicantur, and all things are dried vp; but when hee sendeth them out, they destroy the earth: and in the 26. Chapter. Hee bindeth the waters in the cloudes; but these bonds God looked at that time of the generall floud, and called vp the waters which slept in the great deep: and these ioyning together couered the earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, hee then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast causes, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into aire, formerly condensed into drops.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen.

NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of those waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne wife, and his sonnes, and his sonnes wiues, taking with them of euerie creature, which tooke life by generation, seuen of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophetic of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whome after-times gaue many names answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Oggyes, because in the time of the Grecian Oggyes there was also a great floud of Achia: Saturne they called him, because hee was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. Hee had also the name of Ianus, (id est) vinofus, because Iain, signifieth wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris ritualibus, in the bookes of ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ioue: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fained Gods. And this name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syriac, and not from the Latine: for it was in vſe before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that name knowne. Of the antiquite of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giuech this testimonie. *IANI atate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hieserat villa regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & far primus populos docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim arvas & Pomaria & sacra docuit. In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: he first set up Altars, instituted gardens and solitary groves, wherein they used to pray, with other holie rites and ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilſt Noah flourished, there was not any King or Monarch: Armo being the first that tooke on him soveraigne authoritie. Secondly, Noah after the flood was the first that planted the Vine, and became a husbandman; and therefore offered the first fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, hee was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God, a thanks-giving for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the name of Bispons (which was giuen to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the flood, quia praterita novavit, & futura prospexerit, saith Arnobius. Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shadowed by the name of Chaos, and emmen orbis, the seede of the world; because out of that confused heape was drawne all the kinds of beaſts and plants: so from Noah came all mankind: to whereof Ovid in the person of Ianus:*

Ovid. de fastis. l. 1.

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspice quam longi temporis acta cano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeares
By those old times, of which I sing, appeares.

He was also intruded Caelum and Sol, Heauen and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Verumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus, and Alex. Aphrodisius so call, because he was the iustifier of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the flood. For the Greekes called Liber Phos, and his Nurles Hyades, of raine, because Noah entred the Arke, when the Sunne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a constellation in the brow or necke of Taurus; and euer after a monument of Noahs flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine God, the Sonne of Neptune: because hee liued in saletrie on the waters. So was he knowne by the name of Dionysus, quasi diuivorus, mentem pungens, bite-braine, or wit-singer, though Dionysus conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à patrie & loco, of his Father, and the place of his birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nisa a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurorhagus; because he first yoked Oxen and tilled the ground, according to that of Moses. And Noah became an husbandman. Now howsoever the Gracians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certaine that the name was borrowed, and the inuention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Boacchus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot bee doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Booke, and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah was surnamed Nysus, of the mountaine Nysa in India, where the Gracian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoever themselves saie of his enterprises; and these mountaines of Nysa ioyned with those of Paropamisus. And those other Easterne mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second parent of mankind might might the better be preferred, there were founded by his issues many great Cities which bare his name; with many riuers and mountains: which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we finde the Cittie of Noah vpon the banks of the red Sea and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomee Danus; diuiding Syria from Pannonia. Thus much for the name.

§. VIII.

Of sundrie particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion and name.

NOw in what part of the world Noah built the Arke, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither doe I finde any approved Authour that hath written thereof: only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiuech, that Noah built his Arke neare the mountaines of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nysai, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, hee found all their burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also hee addeth the conueniencie of riuers, to transport the Timber which hee vsed, without troubling any other carriages.

Only this wee are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne world; and to my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the flood. For Noah did not vse any mast or saile (as in other ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue then the Hulke or body of a ship doth in a calme Sea. Also because it is not probable, that during these continual and downe-right raines there were any windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together. For it is written: God made a winde to passe upon the earth, and the waters ceased; and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fill of the waters, there was not any storme or forcible winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion bee true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not raised in forme of a ship with a sharpnesse forward, to cut the waves for the better speede.

Gen. 8. 1.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucations ship: and some say, that the hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes hee arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Steph. de Urbib. Paulanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nympe Cleodora, called Parnassus, the inuentor of Auguration.

Steph. de Urbib.
Paulanias.

Pencrus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinks it deriued from the Hebrew word Nchas, which signifieth Auguration and Divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron, but herein lieth the difference betweene Aron and Thebet. That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe vpon the waters.

Epiph. in Auerq.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a couer and rooff, with a cress in the middle thereof, and the sides declining like the rooffe of an house; to the end, both to cast off the waters, and that threunder Noah himselfe

Gen. 6. 4.

himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomnesse of the many beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Of what wood the Arke was built it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place only vsed is diuersly vnderstood; and though the matter bee of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pinetree, the Rabbins Cedar, the Sequentie square timber, the Latine smooth timber. Others will haue it Cypres trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is wearneat funerals. But out of doubt if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kinde of timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; if not, hee was not then curious as touching the kinde or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant.

Plin. lib. 6. c. 40.

Plinie affirmeth that in Aegypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the worne eates not; and he auoweth that he saw in Vtica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Cittie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kinde of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet fauour, lasting also better then any other wood, and because neare the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the mountaines of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Peregrinus conceiuet that the Arke had diuers sorts of timber, and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another, all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a ship, as well for the body, as for matts and yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines, thereby to secur the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserve their seuerall sorts of foode; and that it might be capable of all kinde of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his Angels steered this ship without a rudder, and directed it without the helpe of a Compass or the North starre. The pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kinde of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea or Asphaltus: and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India, and herein it exceedeth other pitch that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire only, after the manner of hard waxe.

Peregrinus.

§. IX.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

He Arke according to Gods commaundement had of length three hundred cubits, fiftie of breadth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion it had fixe parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which St. AUGUSTINE. Procul dubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo ciuitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, quae sit salua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisq. eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines praeannuntius est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the Cittie of God, translating in this world as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saved by the tree whereupon the Mediatour betweene God and Man, the man Iesus Christ did hang: for euen the very measure of the length, height, and breadth, answereth the shape of mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was foretold and performed.

By

lib. 1. c. 26.

By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath beene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these. The first kinde of cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the palme cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly there is a fift cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common cubits. But of all these sortes, which were commonly measured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies: so is the common cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

St. Augustine considering the many sortes of beastes and birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical cubit, which containeth almost six of the Common. For measuring the Arke by the vulgar cubit, it did not exceed the capacitie of that vessel built by Thero of Syracuse, or the ship of Ptoleme Philopater. But St. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical cubit; and found vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a bodie to preserve all sortes of creatures by God appointed to be rescued. For it was not needfull to take any Kindes of fishes into the Arke, because they were kept liuing (saith St. Augustine) in their owne element. *Non fuit necesse conseruare in aqua possent in aquis vivere; non solum mersa sicut pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multa aliter. It was not needfull to conserue those creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the waters: and not onely fishes which can liue vnder water, but also those fowles which sit and swimme on them: and againe, Terra non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non huius, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit. It was the earth, and not the waters, which God cursed: for of the forbidden fruit of the earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat; so as St. Augustine gathereth hereupon, (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.*

And if wee looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, wee shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischief and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reason finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing and of seuerall Kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For those beastes which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them: seeing they might be generated againe by others, as the Mules, the Hyana's and the like: the one begotten by Asses and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by differing in colour or stature from those of these Northerne parts, it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which were red and pyed skinned, or feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or black: they are mostly mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion I finde no difference, but only in magnitude, betwene the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India, and euen those dogges which are become wilde in Hispagniola, with which the Spaniards vsed to decour the naked Indians, are now changed to wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattle, and doe also oftentimes teare asunder their owne Children. The common Crowe and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Blackbird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation: in the North parts of Virginia. The dogfish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Aegros, which we call the Black-mores non animalia rationalia not men, but some kinde of strange beastes: and so the Giants of the South America should bee of another kinde, then the people of this part of the World. Wee also see it daily that the natures of fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good fruit by often grafting, and the best Mellons will change in a year or two to common Cowcumbers by being set in a barren soile: Therefore taking the Kindes precisely of all creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the earth by his ordinance produced: The Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit was sufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For it we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the Common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantic stature (and lesse allowance we cannot give to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 50. foot deepe.

But first of all to make it manifest, that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the bed of Qg King of Babel had been nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of 6. Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull, a proportion credible if these Cubites had beene Geometrical, then had bene 54. foot in height and vpwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath bene nine foot long, and farre waightier and bigger then all Dauids bodie, who carried it away.

Again if the Geometrical Cubit had been vsed for a measure in the Scriptures as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe five Cubites of length, five of breadth and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vp right, and so must their Priests haue ascended by steps or ladders to haue performed their sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement given in these wordes: Thou shalt not goe vp with steppes unto mine altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three Common Cubites high which make foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantic stature; which measure (doubtlesse) might giue much the more capacitie to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this meanes there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot bee prserued in the waters, might according to their present quantites bee contained in a vessel of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the daies of Noah might haue room sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures, to be sau'd (that is) seuen of the cleane, two of the vnclane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, But so hath very learnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie cubits, sheweth the whole capacitie to haue bene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walles, and other partitions of lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the rooofe which (the perpendicular being one cubit) contained 7500. cubicall cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a ship of such greatnesse wee seeke room for 89. distinct Species of beasts, or (least any should be omitted) for 100. feuerall kinds, we shall easily finde place both for them, and for the birds, which in biggnesse are no way answerable to them, and for meate to sustaine them all. For there are three fortes sorts of beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beece, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeues, one Lyon to two Wolues, and so of the rest. Of beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the law of Moses, whereof seuen of a kinde entred into the Arke, namely three couples for breed, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie Kindes were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great beasts cleane, and fixe and fiftie vnclane, estimable for largenesse as 91. Beeues; yet for a supplement (least perhaps any Species be committed) let them be valued, as 120. Beeues. Of the lesser sort, feeding on vegetables were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supplie, as foure score Sheepe. Of those which deuour flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to three score and foure Wolues. All these 280. beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke in their feuerall Cabines; their meate in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his familie, and all their necessaries.

§. X.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Seythia.

†. I.

A preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute; but he receiued the Commandement from God 100. yeares before the waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of decks & partitions, which Origen deuides into foure, St. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the land, other times in the waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartas) the Sea-cowes or Sea-horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a fish-pool might be made aswell within the Arke, as in Hiero his ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolishie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had windores of Cristall to receiue in light, and keepe out water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the world the Arke rested after the flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe only and truly teach the worlds plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the flood; and all storie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

†. II

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the flood, and from what part of the world the children of Noah trauielled to their first settlement and

and plantation, I am resolu'd (without any presumption) that therein the moit writers were vterly mistaken. And I am not led fo to thinke out of my humour or newncle of opinion, or singulartie; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the moit probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke stayed vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiai in Armenia the greater: (as the wordes Gordai and Kardu seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the moit of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Amnius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocala, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocala. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocala; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie calls Ocelis, Pmetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocala of Damascenus or rather of Amnius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordai, and Curtius Cordas: Ptolomie Gordai and Gordiai: of which the Countrie next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Ninnyada or rather Minni: which word is vled for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordien or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated a part from all other to the North of that Ledge of mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neare the Lake Thospitis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordai (that which summouneth therest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent, because of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus uolubus (Kubaris). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. saies, the place is called uolubartius (as it were the descent or coming downe) and Epiphani. l. 1. cont. Hæres. calls it uolub: which word in the Armenian and Aegyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to be deriued; and Act. 6. 9. that they belonged to the Synagogue of the Aegyptians are called Libertini, for Lubratenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age: receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come soone, had they come from so neare a place as Armenia.

BVt there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeare, or in the yeare 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chusli, and Chaldaa. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeares in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interiacont, which might by ealie iourneys haue been past ouer in 20. daies; and to haue made where thin passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered it selfe, which is euerie where tranpassible by boats of great burden: so as where the Desert on the one side resisted their expedition, the riuer on the contrarie side serued to aduance it; the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foot of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surplise of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the eare of reason, that they would haue spent many yeares in that low and ouerflown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riuers which imbroider or compasse it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they beganne to prouide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod beganne his Kingdome, the 20. first knowne Citie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeares, or (as others suppose) ten yeares later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, Togel vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Eastern people were most ancient in populosity, and in all humane glorie.

FOr a second Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more waight then any thing which hath bene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vse of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may ealie perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordinance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonij Tiani, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous wordes: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betweene Hyphasis and Ganges, vse not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules, Aegyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whom they receiued the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Sethor Henoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Eastern world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuise of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practise thereof to Rome: and after that Nicolaus Gersan a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to bee but newly borne, the Chinians had letters long before either the Aegyptians or Phenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeares since discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinases account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witnesse, who found more Citties and sumptuousitie in that little kingdom of Perus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other traualles and undertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatness had not traualled so farre to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrey, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the vttermoſt Angle and Island thereof, we shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more salvage. And of the Ile of Japan (now Zipangu) Venetus maketh this report. Incolereligionem, literis, & sapientia sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exerceant: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant. The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernement, is reported to be such by those who haue bene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and diuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMI RAMIS found in the East Indies.

BVt for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to inuade India, to which he adioyneth also 500000. Horſe, and 100000. Waggon: whereof if we beleuee but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrey after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most aproued Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came into Shinar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurabates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES, autis maioribus quam quae erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVROBATES gathering together greater troups then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had bene increased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Arme of Staurabates mult haue been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colomes sent thither had bene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of languages. For if we allow 65. yeares time after the flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, 30. yeares to Cush, ere he began Seba, after whom hee had Hamulab, Sabrah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then 30. yeares to Raamah, ere hee began Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and five yeares to his five elder brothers, which make 65. and then twice 30. yeares for two generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third generation might grow vp, which makes in all 125. yeares, there will then remaine like yeares to haue bene spent in trauiailing from the East; ere they arrived in Shinar in the yeare after the flood: 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arrived at Shinar in the yeare 101: and the confusion to haue bene at Pelegys birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time; and build Nimrods Tower in theayer; and not on those low and marish groundes (which require found foundations) in the Plaines of Shinar. For except that huge Tower were built in a daie, there could be no confusion in that yeare 101. or at Pelegys birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped regall authority in the 131. yeare after the flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted fourtie yeares: (according to Gylenus) hominibus ea perficienda totis 45. annis incaussis laborantibus: Men labouring in vaine 45. yeares to finish it. By which account it falls out; that it was 170. yeares after the flood, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly bee believed, that Staurabates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperre of all that part of the world; gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument, from diuers considerations in the person of NOAH.

Forthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeares, was all that space 130. yeares after the flood without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the westerne world; (which traualles Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then couered with many yeares planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: For it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a vineyard, and became a husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth, and not to range ouer so many parts of the world; as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where hee should (if the tradition be sound) haue left certaine Colomes: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spaine, where they say hee sedled other companies, & built Citties after the names of Noela and Noegla his sons wiues: from thence into Italy, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Aegypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeares; but then finding no amendment they say hee banisht him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Ammianus, a plaine imitation of the Gracian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue conceiue, what it was to trauaile farre in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood the same lay wast and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeares, and wherein there could hardly be found either path or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bulhes and bryars that in those yeares were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italic or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authoritie, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue undertaken that vnbeleeueng presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preuaient perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authoritie which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as what foucney they had vainly conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobayed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regal authoritie ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by them selues purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to rise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a proouocation of God to lay on them the curse, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest troope, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vntured. Nimrod and Calestinus take the testimonie of Methodius Bishop of Tybe for warrant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Iocan: of which Nimrod commanded the issue of Cham, Iocan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sonnes of Sem: Iocan Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning to Indus; and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Iocan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) with drawne himselfe, and rested a part with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heauenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For hee landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thanks-giuing to God by sacrifice, hee is not remembered in the Scriptures, because hee was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

¶ VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor vpon BEROSVS: that the Arke rested vpon Montes Caspij in Armenia, and yet vpon Gordias, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annus, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspij, which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordias, hee hath no other shift to vnite these opinions, but by vniting those farre distant mountaines together. To effect which he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error which haue carefully ouersene, printed, and published Ptolomies Geographic, in which they are altogether disseuered: for that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills six degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanuanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annus withall: for in those the mountaines Caspij stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordias, which make 420. miles. And for those Authors by whose authoritie Annus strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this vnegement vpon them in the like dispute. Aberant vero omnes, non negligentia, sed errorum suus ignorantia, They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquitie of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeares before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia Saga the stocke of mortal men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembered (who were so called, because saved from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANNVM cum DYRIM & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrosum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANNVS came with DYRIM and with the Galli the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur. Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annus, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie calleth the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who defended of these Scythians. Now that which Annus laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith a nation of Scythians called Araxes, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neare the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Authour Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part vtterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, in Scythia Saga mankind was restored, hee therefore in the Proame of his Commentarie vpon Berosus, leauech out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his wordes, and writes homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is vndoubtedly vnder the mountaines of Paropamisus, on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annus hath is out of Diodorus: where hee hath read, read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may fee his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fallhood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approved and diligent Authour beginneth in that place with these wordes. Fabulantur Scythia, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hercof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca, which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleueeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Countrie about Araxes Ptolomie calleth Colthene and Sodocene and Sacape, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. severall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

Tab. Aste. 7. &amp; 8

But to come to those later Authours, whereof some haue written, others haue scene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: 20 (for Scythia without these mountains is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdiani, Margiani, vñq. ostia Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc vñq. ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur, Scythia within the mountain Imaus is that part of the world, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaus mountains: on the North by unknowne lands: on the South by the Sacca (which are the Saca) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a 30 part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sancta regio est, & quæ innumerat nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations, (saith Niger, much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he disleuereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leauech on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier Iohn Planerpio (cited by Vincennius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus 40 an Armenian borne, of the bloud of those Kings, (though afterward a Monke) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races descended: though he write that florid at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Mathias a Michou (a Canon of Craconia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that traualled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose traualles are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others hee bueth that ancient and receiued opinion. That out of the mountains Rhiphei, and 50 Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Riuer of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnauferable experience, that there are no such mountains in verum natura; and (indeede) the heads and fountaines of those famous Riueres, are now by the trade of Muscovia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and and marsh grounds. The Riuer of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Imanoyfer in the great wood Okenitzkiles or sepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great wood Podkonzi: from which Lake the two other famous Riueres flow of Borsythian (now Nyger) and Dsuina or Diudina. And this learned Polonius doth in this sort bound the Europææ Sarmatia. In Sarmatia Europæa, &c. are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa (the name perchance misprinted Vissa for Vissla, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia) and for the 10 East border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem, Scythia within the mountain Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe about three hundred and a few odde 20 yeares before his owne time: these be his wordes. Constat esse gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis, (mutatis scilicet) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam, it is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entreinto Asia, and gat new feates a little more then three hundred yeares since: For (indeede) before that time the Goths or Poloci inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Mathias liued in the year 1511. and this his discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augspain the year 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) come from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythia Saca were those people which liued at the North foote of those mountains of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or beginne to mixe themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the general description of the earth now extant, and the witnesse of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East foote of which Sea, but not on the 30 West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeede) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Iaxartus and Iactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

†. VIII.

The fift argument, The Vine must grow naturally neare the place where the Arke rested.

40

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall finde that the fruit of the Vine or Rayn did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Countrey. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturius into Latium: yea 50 at such time as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained betwene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neare vnto the Senones, where they continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they halted to inhabite that Countrey, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from elsewhere into Italie.

Now it is manifest that Nash traualled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the world among his children: and the first thing he did was to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after his sacrifice and thanks-giving to God; and wherefoever the Arke rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare that he traualled farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husbandman, and not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the wordes of the Text. The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

And that all the children of Nash came together into Shinar, it doth not appeare, sauing that it may be inferred out of these wordes (from thence) because it is written: So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these wordes of Sybbils (as they are conected) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinar, for they haue this limitation. Quidam eorum turrem edificauerunt altissimam, quasi per eam cælum essent ascensuri. Certamine eorum turrem aedificauerunt altissimam, quasi per eam cælum essent ascensuri. Certamine eorum turrem aedificauerunt altissimam, quasi per eam cælum essent ascensuri.

†. X.

An answer to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the hills there.

But before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Nash was forsaken by the waters on the mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these wordes. The Arke rested on (or vpon) the mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, saith the marginall note of Genes. the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu, of which the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, that the Arke first fate thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia all one, neither is any part, or any of those mountaines of equall stature to many other mountaines of the world; yet indeede it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Nash came out of the Arke. Now if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the bookes of the Sybbils it is written, that the mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke layed after the flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these mountaines, and to prooue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the Citie of Calenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Aras, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneith it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordian mountaines in Armenia. Wee may also finde a great mistaking in Iosephus, (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene Armenia and Parthia toward Adiabene, and affirmeth affirmeth withall, that in the Prouince of Caren by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes referred some peeces of Nashs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Affrya: so that all Media and a part of Affrya is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discouerie of the mountaines Cordiei was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs farre from the wordes of that Berosus, which wandereth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Ammius: For Berosus cited by Iosephus hath these wordes.

10 *Fertur et nauis huius pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordieum superesse, et quosdam bitumen inde abrasum scum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines uti solent, (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordian mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the bitumen or pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in steade of an amulet. But Ammius his Edition of the fragment of Berosus vlteth these wordes. Nam eleuata ab aquis in Cordia montis vertice quieuit, inus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, et homines ex illi bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem. For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordian mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the bitumen to purge by sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written: The ancientest Berosus writes Cordias with a (C) and the Fragment Gordias with a (G): the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preferatiue against poison or incantment; the other in sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them vlteth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both but by heare say, and therefore of no authoritie nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.*

Furthermore, these mountaines which Ptolomie calls Gordias, are not those mountaines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne wordes: Montes Armenia nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur usque ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadociam; et mons qui Paryardes dicitur. The mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, which stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the hill which is called Paryardes; which mountaines Plinie calleth Parietris, and both which lye to the North of Gordias or Boris, in 43. and 44. a halfe; and the Gordian mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the mountaines of Gordias, otherwise Boris Kardu or Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Togordiaion) are the highest of the world, the same is absolutely false.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills then the Armenian.

For the best Cosmographers with other, that haue seen the mountaines of Armenia, finde them farre inferiour, and vnder-set to diuers other mountaines euen in that part of the world, and elsewhere: as the mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lacus, (saith Castaldus) is farre surmounting any mountaine that euer hath beene scene in Armenia: for it calleth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpward: of which Plutarch. Athos admirat latera Lemnia bouis, Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnia.

nos. Also the mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that height, as neither the windes, cloudes, or raine ouertop it. Again, the mountaine of Antandrus in Myſia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be ſeene from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania neare the Sea, the famous mountaines of Atlas, of which Herodotus. Exstat in hoc mari Mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſſe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non poſſint. Vpon this coaſt there is a mountaine called Atlas, whoſe height is ſaid to be ſuch, as the eye of no mortall man can diſcerne the top thereof. And if we may beleue Ariſtotele, then are all theſe inferior to Caucasus, which hee maketh the moſt notorious both for breadth 10 and height. Caucasus mons omnium maximus, qui aſſium ad ortum ſunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga a ſole radiantur uſq; ad continicum ab ortu: Et iterum ab occaſu, Caucasus (ſaith Ariſtotele) is the greateſt mountaine both for breadth and height of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightened by the Sunne beames, uſq; ad continicum (which is ſaith Macrobius) betweene the firſt crosſing after midnight and the breake of day: Others affirme that the top of this mountaine holds the Sunne beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleue either: for the higheſt mountaine of the world knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes companie at any ſuch late houres. Beſides, theſe mountaines which A- 20 riſtotele calleth Caucaſi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colechis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colechis, Iberia, and Albania, from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phyſis riſeth in the ſame mountaine, which himſelfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phyſis ſpringeth from thoſe hilles which ſunder Chelmeſ from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is maniſeſt) yeeldeth it ſelfe to the Sea two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howfoeuer Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this ſtorie we ſhould take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth firſt appeare, that there is no certainetie what mountaine Ararat was: for the bookes of the Syblis ſet it in Phrygia: and Beroſus in Armenia: and as for Beroſus authoritie, thoſe men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the higheſt hill, and therefore moſt likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the aſſertion and ſuppoſition haue equall credit: for there are many hils which exceede all thoſe of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not 40 follow (as is before written) that the Arke ſhould ſit on the higheſt.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any ſuch Hill in Armenia, or inverum natura, as Baris: for Baris (ſaith Herome) ſignifieth high Towers: and ſo may all high hils be called indifferently; and therefore wee may better giue the name of Baris to the hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riſeth) then to any hils of Armenia. For thoſe of Caucasus in the Eaſt, are vndoubtedly the higheſt of Aſia.

Fourthly, the Authours themſelues doe not agree in what Region the mountaines Gordiaei ſtand: for Ptolomee diſtinguiſheth the mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiaean, and calleth thoſe of Armenia Mofchici and Paryardes, as aforeſaid. Now Paryardes is ſeated neare the middle of Armenia, out of which on the Weſt ſideriſeth Euphrates, and out of the Eaſt ſide Araxis: and the mountaines Mofchici are thoſe hils which diſioyne Colechis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Countrie of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

†. XIII.

Of the contrarie ſituation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the ſame ledge of hils running from Armenia to India ſhould keepe the ſame name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat.

LAſtly, we muſt blow vp this mountaine Ararat it ſelfe, or elſe wee muſt digge it downe, and carrie it out of Armenia; or finde it elſewhere, and in a warmer countrie, and (withall) ſet it Eaſt from Shinaar: or elſe wee ſhall wound the truth it ſelfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the miſtaking open to euery eye, wee muſt vnderſtand, that Ararat (named by Mofes) is not any one hill, ſo called, no more then any one hill among thoſe mountaines which diuide Italia from France is called the Alpes: or any one among thoſe which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as theſe being continuations of many hils keepe one name in diuers Countries: ſo all that long ledge of mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomee both Taurus, Niphates, Coatrus, Coronus, Sarphi, vntill they encounter and croſſe the 20 mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, becauſe from thence or thereabout they ſeeme to ariſe. So all theſe mountaines of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caſpij, Mofchici, Amazonicis, Heniochi, Seythici, (thus diuerſly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomee calſ by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caſpium and Euxinus: as all thoſe mountaines which cut a ſunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the ſtreight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as theſe mountaines of Ararat runne Eaſt and Weſt: ſo doe thoſe maruaillous mountaines of Imaus ſtretch themſelues North and South; and being of like extent well neare are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth theſe former hils Taurus, and Mofes the hils of Ararat. The reaſon of ſeueral names giuen by Ptolomee was thereby the better to diſtinguiſh the 30 great Regions and Kingdomes, which theſe great mountaines bound and diſſeuer;

as Armenia, Mefopotamia, Aſſyria, Media, Suſiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Arax, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paraponiſus: hauing all theſe Kingdomes either on the North or South ſide of them. For all the mountaines of Aſia (both the leſſe and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they ſeuer and diuide particular places and regions. For theſe mountaines which ſunder Cilicia from the reſt of Aſia the leſſe on the North ſide, are called Taurus; and thoſe mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running Eaſt and Weſt, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates for- 40 ceth her paſſage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her Weſt banke, and on her Eaſt ſide the mountaines are ſometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomees three tables of Aſia) and ſometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation ſo long as they bound Armenia from Mefopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them aſunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they ſeparate Aſſyria and Media; but then they call themſelues Coatrus, though betweene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appear, but altogether diſcontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Eaſterne Media by peeces: in the middle of which Region they call themſelues Orontes, and towards the Eaſt part Coronus, out of the Southerne 50 part whereof the Riuer of Euphrates riſeth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their courſe Eaſtward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themſelues into the mountaines of Sarphi, out of which riſeth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her ſelfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neare their waies end, they first make themſelves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the title of Parapanisus; and lastly of Caucas, euen where the famous Riuer of Indus with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zoradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these mountaines build themſelves exceeding high, to equall the strong hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of latitude, and in 140. of longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucas (saith Ptolomeus) that is, betweene Parapanisus and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the mountaine Caucas and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

Now in this part of the world it is, where the mountaine and Riuer Taurus, and the mountaine Nysus (so called of Bacchus Nysus or Nysa) are found: and on these highest mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-Sythica hee hath many good arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrional latitude are the most delicate Vines of the world, namely, in Indea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these mountaines, Strabo affirmeth that the most excellent Vines of the world are found; the clusters of grapes containing two cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses direction found bunches of equall bignesse at Escol.

Num. 13. 24.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neare the mountaine of Meros did Alexander cast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate wine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

40

And therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those mountaines doe also trauesse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high hills, euen from Cilicia to Parapanisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betweene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entrench by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it washeth the coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betweene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo Adriaticum: betweene Athens and Asia Aegeum: betweene Seisus and Abydus Helleſpont: and after ward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonycum: and on this side, the Brittan Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick; and then the Frozen.

E. 4. 27.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither disinction, nor other construction then the wordes beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely where the sense is plaine, (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no sublequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our felicitie any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our felicitie, that euerie word (as aforesaid) hath his waight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as St. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of Christ Iesus (which is) Neguis aliter accipiat, quod narrantibus discipulis Christi in Euangello legerit, quam si ipsam manu Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conſpexerit. That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which hee readeth in the Gospell, (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the verie hand of the Lord, which hee bore in his owne bodie, setting it downe.

- 20 The wordsthen of Moses which end this dispute are these. And as they went from the East they found a Plaine in the land of Shinar, and there they abode, which pro-ueth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the Eastward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places whereof Moses maketh a difference of Countries, hee alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were scated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Iocan, he nameth sephar, a mount in the East: where hee remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth. And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod toward the East.
30 to he departed from Sechem, he vsed these wordes. Afterwardes removing thence unto a mountaine Esau: and from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterwarde in the ninth verse of the same chapter it is written. And Abraham went forth iourneying towardes the South: also when Ezechiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, hee sheweth that these nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that shee came from the South to visite Salomon: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Indea, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from 40 Bethel to Aegypt directly South; and the Caleſyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina: and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that valley of Babylonia, is not a iourneying from the East, nor so neare vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose handes the holy Ghost directed) that hee erred toto caelo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in fortie five; and those Gordian mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the valley of Shinar are situated in thirtie five,
50 and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betweene East and West) the Gordian mountaines stand in 75 degrees, and the valley of Shinar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinar Northwest, ninetie five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the compasse. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, in scripturis ne minima minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabe, apices, et puncta in diuina scriptura plena sunt sensibus, In the scriptures the least difference may not bee omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and a point in diuine scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleue Writers (of little authoritie) who also speake by hearesay and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all aduenture. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also, which ouertopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne mountaines, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the mountaines of Ararat, and not on those mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, 20 where he planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero NOACHO agricultura studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eam rem suam ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratq; est, The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that hee was no wanderer: and that hee troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of the prison of the Arke, 30 whereinto God had committed him to preserve him and mankinde.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the flood; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repopled.

10

Whether SEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

Of these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeares, but in vertue, as by the examples of Henech, Abraham, Jacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes, this is the ground of the controuersie? The Latine translation, and so the Geneva, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the

10. v. 21. in these wordes. Vnto SEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner. To SEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it beene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly vnderstood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the fiftie hundredth year of his life, begat the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the sixe hundredth year (to wit) the hundredth year following, came the generall flood; two yeares after which Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noahs life, and in the year of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeares old, two yeares after the flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeares old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeares old at the flood, and in the sixe hundredth year of Noahs life, and not two yeares after. Which seeing the Scripture before remembered hath denyed him, and that it is also written. Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneva, Iunius turnes it filius minimus, his youngest sonne; but St. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father, (whose nakednesse hee derided) was disinherited, and lost the prebeminencie of his birth, as Esau and Reuben did. Per- In Gen.

auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to beginne with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this waightrie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Saviour were defended of him. And therefore, whether wee shall follow the Vulgar Paganius, and the Genea, who agree in this conuersion, Shem frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Petrus, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue leene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Petrus qualifyeth the strength of the former argument, That Shems age at the time of the flood did not agree with his eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeares old, and begat Arphaxad two yeares after the flood; and againe in the 12. Verse. So Shela liued after he begat Eber, foure hundred and three yeares, &c. so as the number of two yeares, of three yeares, of five yeares, and afterward of two yeares were alwaies 20 precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world, as that all Histories must yeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lordes of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BUt let vs goe vnto the worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall finde that many Nations haue sprung or faired themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approched the bounds of their countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch defended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures howe the Sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Authour may receiue allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, wee must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authority. All record, memorie, and testimony of antiquitie whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath bene borrowed thence, and therefore later then it, as all careful obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Enschius in the Proeme of his Chronologie. Moses is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Trojan warre; and farre before HERCVLES, MVSÆVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVS, ESCVLAPVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the Gods of the Nations, their ceremonies, or holy rites, or Propheies: and before all the deedes of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue seated in the toppe and highest Turrey of their Diuinitie.

Cicero de nat. Deorum. l. 3.

For of the three Iupiters remembered by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Aether, whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Aegypt. Eduxit Moses populum Deix Aegyptio nouissimo tempore per CECROPIS Atheniensis Regis, Moses brought the children of Israel out of Aegypt, in the last dayes of CECROPIS King of the Athenians (saith St. Augustine) and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Cittie it selfe, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuerly proued, and by many learned Authours, I will not cut a sunder the purpose in hand by alleadging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

10	The Sonnes of Japhet were,	{	Gomer.	{	Askenah.

			Tiras.

First, we are to consider that the world after the flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings, to flie from Shinaar to the vttermolt border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the world before the flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all-adventure, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authours, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aeneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build herein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon reason and nature. First, therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery where had in the 130. yeare after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfull valleys with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our felues thereby, what wonderfull desarts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reedes, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles; and what marishes, Fens and bogges, all the face of the earth (excepting the mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our climate (where the dead and destroying winter depresseth all vegetatiue and growing nature, for one halfe of the yeare in effect) yet in twentie or thirtie yeares these our grounds would all ouergrow and be couered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods or with other offenseue thicket and bushes: much more did all sorts of plants, reedes, and trees, prosper in the moist fruitfull Vallies, and in the climate of a long and warme Sommer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeares, to raise themselves without contemlement.

This being considered it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whome Nimrod (either by order or strength) tooke the dominion, did after the confusion of languages, and at such time as they grew to bee a mightie people disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said vally of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first posselt; yet could hee not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For we finde, that Abraham the true successor of Shem dwelt in Chaldea at Vr; and from thence (called by God) he flicke to Charan in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he trauielled to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seuen descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea: where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded inhabited for many yeares, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Ninieue. In deed deed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can knowe were, in that age of the illues of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking little effect, untill diuers yeeres were consumed; and untill the time arriued, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan came the people and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Aegypt for many descents together.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in IAPHETHS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie fattering GOMER the sonne of IAPHETH in Italy; and an other of IAPHETHS sonnes TUBAL in Spaine: and of the antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

TO beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iapheths sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinar, was (if the diuision were made at Phalegs birth) in the year of the world 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the year after the flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

Now the habitations proper to the sonnes of Iapheth were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Aegeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, flauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those sens before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southweft, the Ocean to the West, and British, Germane and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North Northeast, and Northwest. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying betwene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creet or Candia, Sticilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their yong ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah. Dilatet Deus IAPHETH, Let God spread abroad (or increase the posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the tents of SHEMA. For though Iunius here vseth the word (allicuius) and not dilatet: and the Geneua persuaides; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of territories; but that thereby they should become participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iapheths sonnes, of whome Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late writers haue followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods raigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Fuacius confirmeth in these words. Anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth year of NIMRODS raigne, COMERVS GALIVS planted a Colonie in that land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same NIMRODS raigne TUBAL seated himselfe in Asituria in Spaine (now called Biscaia) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeeres after the flood, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Cittie and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Fuacius himselfe out of his Authour Berosus witnesseth,) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium, to the the height and magnitude of the mountaines. Sure that both this Cittie and Tower were almost builded the Scriptures witness. But the Lord came downe to see the Cittie and Tower, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of bricke to such a worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall flood covered the highest mountaines fiftene cubits, Let vs build vs a Cittie and a Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach vnto the heauen: meaning, that they would raise their worke about fiftene cubits higher then the highest mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the worke. They also beganne this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly overbearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these wordes. Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which Glycer vpon Genefts giueth fortie yeeres. For it seemeth, that the Tower was neare finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward writtten, So the Lord scattered them from thence vnto all the earth, and they left to build the Cittie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very neare had performed the worke of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the Cittie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the tower was throwne downe) these nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the earth, (that was) when they perceived not one an others speech. Now to think that this worke in the newnesse of the world (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeeres; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year could creepe through 3000. miles of Desert, with women, children, and cattle: let those light beleeuers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeeres in building, or but neare such a time, (and then) when the world had stood 1556. yeeres, it were more then foolishnes and madnes it selfe, to thinke that such a worke as this could be performed in ten; when the world (from the flood to the arrivall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeeres, and whereof they had spent some part in trauielling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that worke 400. yeeres (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an age as when the world flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This worke of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) bee erected in those few yeeres remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or familie of men, with their wives and children, and cattle, to trauaile 3000. miles through woods, bogges, and deserts, without any guide or conductor; and we shall finde it rather a worke of 100. yeeres then of 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they haue not entred the Countrey ten miles in ten yeeres. And if Nimrods people spent many yeeres by the account before remembered in passing from the East-India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. degrees of longitude, untill they came into Shinar which lyeth in 79. degrees (the distance betwene those places containing 36. degrees, which make 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betwene Babylon and Biscaia is much more: for the bodie of Biscaia lyeth in ten degrees, and Babylon or Shinar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinar to Asituria or Biscaia is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers years to find Shinar, which was but 2160. miles : or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little above 400 miles : there is no cause to the contrary , but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000 miles to countries lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the land of Shinar was to Nimrod. For Paradyse was knowne to Noah before the flood : and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the world else it is vnkowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods raigne: Shall the earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a nation be borne at once? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so faue this great trauaile through Desarts by land. But we neuer read of any nauigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarque so great a people as we may iustly suppose those conducters carried with them, will not easily beleue, that there were any vessels in those daies to transport Armies, and (withall) their cattle, by whose milke they liued and fed their children : for milke and fruit were the banquetting dishes of our forefathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of nations valued themselves by the heards and numbers of their Cattle : who had flocks of sheepe, and great droues and herds of their owne, and their owne sheepe-herds and herdsmen. Now if Tubal had part by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, hee might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Tract : past the Streights of Gibraltar, disdained all Andalusia and Portugall, with all those goodly Ports and countries; and haue sought out the yron, wooddie, and barrn Countrie of the world (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous nauigation. But before the iourney of the Argonautes there were scarce any vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world : and yet that which Iafon had (if the tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland : which although it carryed but foure and fiftie passengers, yet was it farre greater then any of the former times: Erat enim antea paruarum nauicularum usus, For in former times they used very small Vessels. I denie not but that the Tyrrians gaue themselves of old to farre-off nauigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of ships vnto them.

But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuiling of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a ship into Greece: and yet the Samosathians challenge the inuention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerus : so others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those ages, as the Egyptians vsed to coast the shores of the red Sea vpon raffles, deuised by King Erythrus : and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kinde of Boar (with which they crosse the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with leather:

leather : of which kinde I haue seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naues ex curio circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith Tertor) : of which Lucan the Poet:

*Primum cans salix, madefacta rovimine, paruum
Texitur in puppim, casq; induta iuuenes,
Vectoris patiens tumidum supercubat amnem.
Sic Venetus stagnante Pado, susq; Britannus Nauigat Oceano.*

The moistned Ofyer of the hoarie Willow
Is wouen first into a little boate:
Then cloath'd in bullocks hide, vpon the billow
Of a proude Riuier, lightly doth it float
Vnder the Waterman:
So on the Lakes of ouerswelling Poe
Sailes the Venetian : and the Brittan so On th'out-spreed Ocean.

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning nauigation were first reuealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betwene the Arke of Noah, and such ships as were for any long nauigation. Ye ancient stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long voyages to Sea : at least with multitudes of women, and children, and cattle : as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now when this Art is come to her perfection, such voyages are very troublefome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that age of Nimrod any ship, or vlc of ships; fit for any long nauigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of nauigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries farre off, I know not how, I will follow herein the relation of Moses and the Prophets : to which truth there is ioynd both nature, reason, pollicie, and necessitie : and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibilitie.

Þ. IIIL

Of GOG and MAGOG, TYBAL and MESECH, seated first about Asis the lesse, out of EZECHIEL.
Cap. 38. 39.

Now although many learned and reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a plantation of the world, which also hath bene and is receiued: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great learned man of this latter age, Arius Montanus was also in some things much mistaken : and for Iosephus, as he hath many good things, and is a guide to many errors withall, so was he in this plantation of the world very grosse and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for currant, haue bene by him farre misled. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the world Gomer the first Sonne of Iapheth possesse, as also Tubal, it is needfull to beginne with Magog : because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that cuer I read) I finde most most iudicious in the examination of this plantation. He takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of all which Gog was Prince or chiefe Conductor in their attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheth issues possit, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the issue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former prophetic in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel propheticeth of the vniing of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Juda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

By which prophetic of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my seruant shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one sheepe-herd, (that is) they shall bee vniued as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel propheticeth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Vniion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receiue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and fought to subiect them: all which were the subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Celestians, next bordering Palestina or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Juda.

The wordes of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man set thy face against Gog, and against the land of MAGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESCH (or MOSCH) and TUBAL: and afterward. Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of MESCH and TUBAL: and in the sixth Verse; GOMER, and all his bands, and the house of TOGORNA of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the purpose of his prophetic, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vaine assaile Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith St. Hierome) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith hee) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana, That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil vnder humane form. Hee addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so be taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this not amisse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeth this obseruation of Bernaldus. Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the letter (H) which is vied but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Helaicidia) is neuer added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or according to others the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 39. Chapter is made manifest. Behold, I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of MESCH and TUBAL.

This must needs be meant by the successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as others conquering Nations) seeke to make the Iewes their Tributaries onely, but endeouored by all means, and by all kinde of violence to extinguish the religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten Gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. St. Ambrose and Iddore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Citties thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabi inhabiting a Region, as Iunius, who saies that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeke storics call Gyges: who in former time hauing slaine Candaules the Lydian, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygen Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie furlongs from Sardis. Plinius calleth it Gygenum stagnum. Hierodotus and Nicanor set it about the Riuer of Hyllus, and Masander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after hee had subdued the Countie about the Riuer Rhodus which runneth into the Hellesponte, called the Promontory Trapese after his owne name Gyges. These opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Iunius. For Magog saith he, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his sonne Craesus; who (as Iunius further notes) hauing mastered all those Regions as farre South as Libanus in that border built the Cittie Gigarta or Gegkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Cittie of Gog) seated in Calestria, whose people were the ancient enemies of the Iewes.

Now that Magog is found in Calestria, Plinius affirmeth saying; Calestria habet Bambycen, que alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syria vero Magog. Calestria habet in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. He further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped, Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the Cittie had anciently another name, which yet he expresth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleue Strabo, then was Edeffa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authours did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the nations of Calestria and the North partes adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter plantation from these partes they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to bee denied, that the Scythians in olde times coming out of the Northeast waited the better part of Asia the lesse, and possit Calestria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Cittie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Juda, according to the wordes of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolomies Kings of Aegypt: to those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the successours of Seleucus, the successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrinus thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rager, mentioned in the storie of Tobias. Plinius takes it not onely to haue bene called Bambyce, as we haue said, but also Edeffa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the knowne name is Allope: for so Berolinus expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Cittie had the title of sacred as the sacred Cittie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatrie, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermaide Atergatis, or Atergatis, according to Plinius, which the Greekes call Derceto.

If then we conferre the wordes of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirty eight chapter, wherein he ioyneth together Gog Mesch, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Cittie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Juda: with whome also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bandes of the North quarters; we may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these followers and vassals of Gog (which were Northerne Nations in respect of Juda) were not the Gomeri- ans of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Caleyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Iosephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein are to be rejected. But if Iosephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonia of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spaine (to wit from that peece of land betwene Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania: (most part posselt by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnance of opinions, it may be granted, that in proceesse of time these people might from their first habitation passe into the Countries neare the Euxine Sea, and from thence after Ages into Spaine.

Iosephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal, from whence (sayth Iustine) they passed into Spaine to search out the mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderstood that it was a Southerlie Countrie and mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of iron, and other mettals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following verses, telling how the Argonauts did visit them.

*Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferris venis scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant:*

The Chalybes plough not their barren foile,
But vndermine high hills for iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toile
For merchandize, which their poore liues sustaines.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was first peopled by the Africans, who had euer since an affection to returne thither, and to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe ouer the Streights into that Countrie; and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, then that in the twelfth yeare of Nimrods raigne, Tubal past into Spaine, and therein built St. Vud: a poore Towne, and a poore deuice, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Moseeb or Mesech, and Tubal neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mesech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their assistants. And that Mesech inhabited Asia, Eumetius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his wordes. MESACVS, qui à MOSE MESECH, prius Mesios ab Adula monte vsq; ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc est terra M A G O C principalis. MESACVS, whom MOSES callet MESECH, placed the ancient Mesians from the mount Adula, vnto the coast of Pontus. And this Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Countrie of M A G O C. And this doth Annius also auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and not North from Iudæa. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal ioynlie. And for a small proofe, that these Nations were of a Northern neighbour land (how farre soeuer stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon horses, euen a great multitude and a mighty people. Then if any man beleue that these troupes came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenæes, and first passed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungrie and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellepont, or else compassed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compasse of the then knowne world, he may be called a strong beleuer, but he shall neuer be iustified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Selenis was a Prouince neighbouring Palestina or Iudæa, and that Therapoli (or Alagag) ioyned vnto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Selenide) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the great: after which they yet posselt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesech be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First hee seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Alagag and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant issue killed all Germanie, reisted long in France and Brittaine, and posselt the vtmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancton well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Vtmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherinto they might exonerate their swelling multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old language doth signifie robbers; necessitie inforcing them to spoile their neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neare ioyned, as afterwards in the seates which they posselt. For that the warlike Nations of Germanie were in elder ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gallæ, the authoritie of Cæsar affirming it is prooue sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those partes, which had formerly bene held by their progenitors. I say not that they claimed those lands as theirs by descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne pedigree. Neither can any man therefore denie, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late ages they returned thither; vnlesse hee will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre partes haue invaded and conquered the land of Shinar, may by that argument bee proued not to haue issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothres for his excellent wisdome surnamed Dis, whome Annius makes the brother of Gomer and Tubal (which brother Moses neuer heard of, who spake his knowledge of Iaphets sonnes) they must deliue him in some old Poet: for Eumetius a great Berosian confesseth. Quis hic Samothres fuerit incertum est, i. who this Samothres was it is vncertaine; neither is there any proofe that he was that same Dis, whome Cæsar sayth the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestour; yea and Vigener confesseth with Eumetius. Mais on ne sçayt qu'il estoit. no man knowes who he was.

Against the fabulous Berosus his fiction. That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his sonnes, I thinke it necessarie to disproue the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himselfe: an inuention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authours of whom himselfe hath commented: as the fragment of Berosus, Fabius Picior, Cato, Launius and others. For Annius seeks to perswade vs, that Noah (surnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Citties in Italie, wherein he liued 92. yeares. This to disproue, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disproue it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chane

Chalme and Nimrod by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great make to be forgotten, with all the actes he did in 92. yeares. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disproue the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so manie learned men haue so demonstratiuely proued that fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Affryian in his oration against the Greekes auoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely 3. Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the succellour of Seleucus Nicator: but Annius hath deuiled 5. Bookes, where-with hee honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Affryians, Annius hath filled this fragment with the businesse of all the world. And if we may beleue Eusebius better then Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Eneas) consumed but 150. yeares: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Eneas arrivall into Italie there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the worldes yeare (as some reckon) 2717. after the flood 1064. and Noah died 350. yeares after the flood: and so there past betweene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeares. For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinius followed Faunus: which Latinius liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Affrya: with Pelagius of Peloponnesus: with Demophoon of Athens and Sampson Iudge of Israell. Now all these five Kings of the Latines hauing consumed but one hundred and fifty yeares; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty yeares, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

Trucit is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they Iou the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they drawe the Jones, who were indeede the children of Ianus, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint Helles; which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Medea, whom they make the parent of the Medes, though they were defended of a farre more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Iapheth.

Lastly we see by a true experience, that the Brittish language hath remained among vs about 2000. yeares, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles: and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grandchild Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue beene found in the languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the same Gracian Ianus, which commaunded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeares, (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinius the first King: which also St. Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibillitie. And if this be not sufficient to disproue this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camsiensis) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holie Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their idolatrous and heathenish ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleue that Noah himselfe, (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and vngratefull, to set vp or deuise any Heathen saluege, or idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any ceremonie, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

d. VI.

That GOMER also and his Sonne T OGORMA of the posteritie of IAPHETH were first seated about Asiathelasse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

10 TO turne now to the Sonnes of Noah, and the worlds plantation after the flood: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keepe intelligence by Riuer: because the land was yet Desert and ouerpreit with woods, reedes, bogges, and rotten marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus tooke the South part of Chaldea, downe the Riuer of Gehon, by which he might passe too and fro from Babylon to his owne plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Fy or Orchana neare the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same Riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of land upon Gehon Southward, 20 Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppressed, till God afterward by the seede of Abraham made them his owne nation and victorious. Hauilah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, tooke both bankes of Tigris, especially on the East side of the Riuer: by which riuer his people might also passe too and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Hauilah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian, or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himselfe tooke the bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-westward towards Arabia the stone, and the Desert, where Ptolomie placeth the Cittie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

30 Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tigris to conuey them into the Persian Gulfe, which washeth the bankes of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Cush might take land downe the Riuer as they pleased. Also the Cittie of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said Riuer of Tigris; and from thence a Colony past to Charran, standing also upon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seats in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Iles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, late 40 downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phoenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spred themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first planters in Asia the lesse, held the Countrie of the Cymmerians (witnesseth Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom St. Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first plantations) gaue names to diuers places; as to the mountaines about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Cittie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this 50 nation, in the outlet whereof was also a Cittie of that name called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, fauouring of brimstone: which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lacrinus.

Ptol. Asia. tab. 4.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptoleme calleth Moschi) inhabite Syracna a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the mountaines Moschici, in the Valley betweene the mountaines Moschici, and the mountaines Paryardes: out of whose North part springeth the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxia; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Mosonians (saith Melaxchion), and it may bee, that in proceesse of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melaxchion) signifieth extends, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma also at first did inhabite amongst his parents and kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblici, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Pharicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieropolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the Prophecie of Ezechiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Fares horses, and horses, and mules, which could not well be driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygiens; which I doe not deny, but they might bee in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeares after the twelfth of Nimrods raigne. The Temes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperour is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Musconis. But for these subterfugations it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this wee must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet spirit, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations can bee hardly knowne: only reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the conduction and dominion ouer the rest.

From Madai the third Sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Græcians bring them (as before) from Medus the Sonne of Medeia.

OF IAVAN the fourth Sonne of IAPHETH: and of MESCH, of ARAM, and MESHECH of IAPHETH.

For Iauan the fourth Sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esai; Et mittam ex i's qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, & Græciam. And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Genea here vnder the word (Tarshich) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsus in many places bee taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Genea vse the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew wordes. Of these Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancestours, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abouting in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts.

parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion; but the antiquitie of Iauan marres the fashon of that supposition, who so many yeares preceeded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Theffalie with all his Fathers treasure, and his brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously receiued by Erichtheus, who gaue him his daughter in marriage; of whom he receiued two sonnes, Ion, and Achæus, the supposed Ancestours of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionia (saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fasteneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these wordes. Hæc non sunt Peloponnesus, sicut Ionia. These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia; and on the other side which looketh towards the South and into Peloponnesus, this. These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecateus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrarie to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certaine companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then he learned of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecateus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past ouer the nearest way, leauing his owne name to some maritime Prouince on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleeueth, that Ionia tooke the name from Ion the sonne of Xuthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times call themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto them, which they held for diuers yeares. And howfoeuer the Greekes vaunt themselves to be the Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approued Historians (not their owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanitie therein. For this dispute of Antiquitie (among prophaned Writers) rested betweene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Iustine out of Trogus, in the warre betweene Tecoris of Egypt, and Tamus of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded far the raigne of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cæcrops time the Greekes were all saluages without law or religion, liuing like brute beasts in all respects; and Cæcrops (saith St. Augustine) liued together with Moscs.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosoch: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betweene Meshech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosoch) the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers interpreters diuersly writtten. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meshech, the sonne of Aram; the Genea Mas; Iunius Moshe. But it may be gathered out of the 120 Psalme, that either Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gaue name to that Prouince wherein Dauid hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Meshech the sonne of Aram. For Dauid bewailing his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious people) vnder these wordes. Uoe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius conuerteth thus. Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ & Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this sense. Uoe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth. Hei mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitauit cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldeans otherwise, and in these wordes. O memiseram, quia peregrinatus sum Asiani, habitauit cum tabernaculis Arabum. O wretch, that I am, for I have trauielled among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacle of the Arabians. But howfoeuer or which soeuer conuerfion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Prouince

of Arabia petraea; and the Chaldaean putteth A'in instead of Meshech; but the Hebrew it self hath Meshech. And if it bee taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Meshech the sonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 1. 7. is called Meshech, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Meshech or Meshech, both bordering Judas, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiele makes Meshech and Tubal. But as for those that take Meshech out of the word Moshech (given by the Septuagint;) to be the Musconian: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that Danuel neuer traualled so farre North; (for to him Musconia was vterly unknowne) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a Citie on the mountains of Samir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Moshech the Father of the Musconians: and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Meshech in Musconia, though with some better aduise of iudgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence trauielling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, (Hei mihi quod exulo in Meshech) to signifie, gentis eius feritatem insignem esse; that the feritie of that nation exceeded: which ferience or brutality of the Musconians, Danuel neuer proued, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the same feritie or cruelty which those Northerne Musconians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Countie tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of 10 quall fiercenesse to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, cuen to this day, (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being forethrew by the speech of the Angell to Hager, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wild man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desert (saith Plinie) confronteth the Arabians Coelei on the East, and the Cedrei Southward, both which ioine together vpon the Nabathai. So it appeareth (as before) that Meshech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did ioine to Meshech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the successours of Selenus, enemies of the reestablishment of Israel and Iuda. But (as I haue already said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Meshech (or Moshech) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and giue names, both to Meshech in the one, and to the mountaines Meshech in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Musconia: and so all opinions faued. But all language Nations ouergrowne and vncultivated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, euen as ciuilitie, letters, and magnificent buildings, witnesse antiquite.

Montan. in Chr.

Tiras, the seuenth sonne of Iapheth, which Montanus reckons among the sonnes of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authours (worthie the examination) affirme. Iosephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the Sonnes of Gomer, which were three:

{ Ascanes, Riphath,
    and Togorma. }

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanes and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Ascanes was the Father of those which the Greekes call Regini, (saith Iosephus) but he giues no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascanes the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their explications are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neare the Riuer of Hylas and Cio: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuscanes were descended of the Ascanes, (for Tuscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, praposto articulo die Ascanes) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the tombs of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the Lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, saith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautiful and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Os humerosq; Deo similis, in face and body like one of the Gods. Virgil also remembreth such a Riuer together with the hills Gargara: as, Ilus ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; fontem Ascanius. Appetite leades them both ouer the mountaines Gargara, and the roring Ascanius. But this Plinie maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the Citie of Brillon vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Midia, and is neare the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanes he directvs to finde by the description of Prusis, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth farre within the Countie of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicca are accounted fiftie and twentie miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betwene Prusia and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanes, to be the inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Vrbibus makes it a Citie of Troas, built by Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas: laying, that there was another of that name in Myria. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Platonie witnesse: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Myria, neare vnto Cio; which also agreeth with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neare Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanes the sonne of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas, it might bee questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Troians, could not take his name from Aeneas sonne, who was then either exceeding young, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the countie whence those succours came were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myria, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Heremie is called Ascanes, by the figure Synchdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceiue not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Heremie we shall learne of what Nation the Ascanes were, whose wordes are these. Set up a Standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanes against her, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most interpreters consent, so called of the mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (saith Iunius and others before him) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which continued all that Traet from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phoenicia and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Jacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padam. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians and Ascanes ioyned with them (who altogether vnto vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoile of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much much to call Askenaz Germanie or Aimaine, for we heare of no Swart Ruttiers at that liege. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect orallied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the disperſion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rhægingi; or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Aimaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

OF Riphath the second ſonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Berodadus and Périerus thinke that hee wandered farre off from the rest of his brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might ſeate himſelfe with the rest of his familie: for there wanted no roome or ſoile in thoſe dayes for all the ſonnes and grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well vnderſtood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (ſaith Melanchton) ſignifieth Giants. Theſe people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the moſt of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greateſt number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who ſpake the ancient Polac: which being firſt called Riphei (for the loue of ſome of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a cuſtome exceeding common in thoſe times) and dwelt firſt in Paphlagonia, as Homer witneſſeth, and ſo doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when theſe Riphei (afterward Heneti) ſought new Regions, they came along the ſhores of Euxinus, and filled the North part of Europe, containyng Ruſſia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they croſt thwar the Land, and peopled Ilyria, deſirous (ſaith Melanchton) of a warmer ſoyle of fruit and Wine. Theſe Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that land betwene the Baltick and Adriatick Sea: and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Ruſſia. This Nation, after they were poſſeſt of Lithuania and Polonia, diſturbed the plantation of the Boji and Hermundurij. Therefore, it ſeemeth to me, that of Riphath came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and ſo thinketh Arias Montanus, firſt ſeated in Paphlagonia, but in courſe of time Lordes of Sarmatia, and thoſe other parts before remembered, chiefly betwene the Riuer of Viſtula and Albis. The name (ſaith Melanchton) ſignifieth wandering or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by white meates and fruits, as (indeede) all Nations did in the firſt Ages.

Of the third Sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue ſpoken already; now therefore of Iauan's children, which were four:

{ Elifa, { Tharſis, { Cethim, { Dodanim,

Of the ſoure Sonnes of IAVAN: and of the double ſignification of Tharſis, either for a proper name or for the Sea.

OF Elifa or Elipha, came the Eoles: and of this Elifa all the Greekes were called Hellenes, ſaith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elifa the Father of the Eoles in Aſia ſide: others of Elia in Peloponneſus, or of both. And ſeeing the Greekes were defended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Eoles and the Eles, tooke name of Elifa, his eldeſt Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. ſpeaking of Tyre, nameth the Iſles of Elifa. Hyacynth et purpura de inſulis Elifa facta ſunt operimentum tuum, Blew ſilke and purple, brought from the Iſles of Elifa, waſthy covering: The Chaldaens for Elifa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneu, and Iunus, keepe the word Elifa: and ſo I thinke they might doe with reaſon. For there was not found any ſuch purple Dye in Italia in thoſe dayes, nor ſince, that I can reaſe of: but thoſe Iſles of Elifa, were by a better coniecture the Iſles of Greece; and the beſt purple was found afterward at Tyre it ſelfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coaſt of Geſtulia.

Tharſis, the ſecond Sonne of Iauan inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharſis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharſis in Cilicia, vnderſtands Carthage in Africa; but (reſeruyng the reſpect due to ſo learned a man) he was much miſtaken in that coniecture. The Chaldaen Paraphraſt puts Carthage for Tharſis, but it hath no authoritie, nor warrant of reaſon therein. So likewiſe, where it is written, that the ſhips of Salomon went euery three yeares to Tharſis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldaen Paraphraſt tranſlates Tharſis (Africa). But Salomons ſhips were prepared in the Red Sea at Eſion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neare vnto Maadan, where Iethra (Moſes Father in law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petraea, Iſumaea, or of the Chuiſites; and they ſailed to the higher part of the Eaſt India. For it had beene a ſtrange nauigation to haue ſpent three yeares in the paſſage betwene India and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue bene ſailed in fixe or ten daies. And if ſo great riches might haue bene found within the bounds of the Mediterranean Sea, all other neighbouring Princes would ſoone haue enterdayned that trade alſo. But this enterpriſe of Salomon is in this ſort written of in the firſt of Kings. Salomo King SALOMON made a Nauie of ſhips in Eſion Gaber, which is beſide Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the land of Edom: and Hyam ſent with the Nauie his ſeruaunts, that were mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the ſeruaunts of SALOMON: and they came to Ophir, and ſet from thence 420 talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vſed for the Sea in generall) ſo, becauſe the Iſraelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterranean in the beginning; and that the people of Tharſis had the greateſt ſhips, and were the firſt nauigators in thoſe parts with ſuch veſſels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharſis vſed often for the Sea. And whereas it is ſaid that the ſhips of Salomon went euery three yeares to Tharſis, that phraſe is not ſtrange at all: for we vſe it ordinarily whereſoeuer we nauigate, (namely) that the Kings ſhips are gone to the Sea, or that they are ſet out euery yeare, or euery three yeares to the Sea; and therefore Tharſis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vſed for the Sea it ſelfe. But in this place Tharſis is truly taken for Tharſis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharſis the ſecond ſonne of Iauan, or by his ſuccellours in memorie of their firſt parent. To this Citie arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the firſt ouerthrow to Darius, and caſting himſelfe into the Riuer to bathe and walke his bodie, he fell into an extreme feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharſis was St. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reaſon and nature of a plantation. For (Gomer and his other ſonnes inhabiting Aſia the leſſe, and that part of Syria adioynyng,) Iauan who was to paſſe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the ſame coaſt, and firſt planted the Iones on that ſhore: gaue the Iſlands betwene Aſia the leſſe and Greece, to Elifa, and left Tharſis vpon the Sea ſide in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third ſonne of Iauan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, ſaith Berodadus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (ſaith he) and ſignifieth percuſſores, though in that reſpect it may be meant by either. But it ſcemeth more probable, that the place of Eſu 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians. Hac calamitas ab Esai prædicta eſt, qui capite viceſimo tertio inquit, venturos esse eueriores Tyri ex terra Cettim, This calamitie (saith MELANCHTON) was foretold by Esa 1 the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cettim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came vnto them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cettim might be taken for Isle, saith Bernadus) yet we must take the first performance of the former prophesie, which tooke effect with the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander: who after seuen Moneths liege entred that proude Cettie, and cut in peeces 7000. principall Cittizens; strangled 2000. and changed the freedome of 13000. others into bondage and slaueirie. Now, that Macedonia was taken for Cethim, it appeareth plainly in the first of the Maccabees, in these wordes. After that ALEXANDER the Macedonian, the Sonne of PHILIP, went forth of the land of Cethim, and slue DARIUS King of the Persians and Medes. IOSEPHVS sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the Cettie Cettim, the Countrie of Zeno the Philosopher (winnesse Laertius) which Cettie Ptolemy vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in St. Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islandes in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islandes of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus bee so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too freight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Ægean sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) late downe at Rhodes, as neare Cethim, Tharsis, and Elifas, he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily bee taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirme. There is also found in Epirus the Cittie of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (scated in a farre lesse Island) did of necessitie send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elifas, he passed a little farther on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Cittie of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his posteritie might giue it that name in memorie of their first parent, as it hapned all the world ouer. For names were giuen to Citties, Mountaines, Riuers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successours many yeares after: euery of their families being desirous to retaine among them by those memories, out of what branch their ciuies were taken, and grafted elswhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Citties often hired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Ancesters, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freeest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands, and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonias, Chaldaas, and the borders thereof towards the West and Southwest: and the sonnes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylon: sit selfe) traualled Southward in Arabia Felix, and Southwestward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the enemies both to the Hebrewes, and to those of the sonnes sonnes of Shem, which spred themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterranean Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seate of CHUS the eldest sonne of HAM was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange fables, and all translations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of IOSEPHVS his tale of an Ethiopesse wife to MOSES, grounded on the mistaking of the seate of CHUS.

That Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm v. 51. Then ISRAEL came to Egypt, and IACOB was a stranger in the land of HAM: and in the 78. Psalm. He slue all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of HAM. There is also found a great Cittie in Thebaida, called Cheraamis; (asit were the Cittie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it commeth now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther prooffe to the former. For the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senselesse interpretations. Surely, howsoeuer the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, yet it is manifest that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petrea, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desert: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylon to Nimrod, wherin they first late downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elswhere, vnderstand Chus for Ethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the wife of Moses (which in Scripture Num. 12. v. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, fainteth that Tharsis the daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he belicged Saba her Fathers Cittie; and to the end to obtaine Moses for her husband, shee practised to betray both her parents, Countrie, and friends, with the Cittie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The tale (if it bee worth the recting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Ethiopian Cittie Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these wordes. Hic cum MOSES desiderasset videre exercitum otioſum agere ferret, hoſte non audente manus conſerere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Aethiopum regiſſia, nomine THARBIS, &c. which tale hath this ſenſe in Engliſh. When MOSES was grieved that his Armie lay idle, becauſe the enemy beſieged, durſt not ſalſe and come to handie ſtrokes, there hapned this accident in the meane while. The Aethiopian King had a daughter called THARBIS, who at ſome aſſaults giuen beheld the perſon of MOSES, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that MOSES had not only up-held and reſtored the falling eſtate of the Egyptians, but had alſo brought the conquering Aethiopians to the very brinke of ſubverſion: theſe things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daylie encreaſed, ſhe made meanes to ſend unto him one of her trueſt ſervants to offer her ſelfe unto him, and become his Wiſſe; 10 Which MOSES on this condition entertained, that ſhe ſhould firſt deliuer the Cittie into his poſſeſſion: whereunto ſhe condeſcending, and MOSES having taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were inſtantly performed.

†. II.

A diſpute againſt the tale of IOSEPHVS.

THIS tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein alſo vterly miſtaken himſelfe, in naming a Cittie of Arabia, for a Cittie of Aethiopia: as he names Aethiopia it ſelfe to haue bene the Countrey of Moses his Wiſſe, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Aethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, ſaying that the Sabaens are Arabians, and not Aethiopians; except Iosephus can perſwade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wiſedome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moore. And though Damianus a Greeke ſpeake of certaine letters to the King of Portugall from Preſter Iohn, of the Abiſſines: wherein that Aethiopian King would perſwade the Portugals that hee was deſcended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeſſe: which had it bene true, it is likely that when Sihac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and ſackt Ieruſalem, his brother (the ſonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioynd vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as alſo giuen aide and ſuccour to Roboam againſt Iereboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing againſt our opinion of Moses his wiſe, to haue bene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Prielt of Midian or Madian: which ſtanding on the North coaſt of the Red Sea, ouer againſt the body of Egypt, and neare Eſion Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumae ioyneeth to the Tribe of Iuda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the Eaſt, to the Mediterran by the Weſt, and to the Red Sea by the South-caſt. And if we marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Iſrael thence, it will appeare that hee was no ſtranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it ſelfe, hee had formerly liued fortie yeares; where it ſeemeth, that beſides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, hee was inſtructed by Iethro in the Egyptian learning. For Iosephus confeſſeth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wiſedome of the Egyptians. But on the other ſide this Text makes much againſt Iosephus, whereit is written in Exodus the ſecond. Therefore MOSES fled from PHARAO, and dwelt in the land of Midian or Midium, and not in Aethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as wordes can expreſſe, in what Region Midian was, where it is written. When MOSES kept the ſheep of IETHRO his Father in law, Prielt of Midian, and draue the ſheepe to the Deſert, and came to the mountaine of GOD in Horeb. Now that mount Horeb is not in Aethiopia, euery Inſtant knoweth. And if wee may beleue Moses himſelfe, then was not the Wiſe of Moses

Moses purchaſed in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and friends) neither had ſhee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was ſhee a Negro, but a Madaniſſiſſe. And as God worketh the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt meanes: ſo it pleaſed him from a ſheep-heard to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people firſt and laſt. For Moses ſitting by a Well (as diſconſolate and a ſtranger) defended the daughters of Reuel from the other ſheep-heards, and drew them water to water their ſheepe: vpon which occaſion (by God ordained) hee was entertained by Iethro, whoſe daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countreies.

10 From hence alſo came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the inſupportable gouernement of ſuch a multitude, hee aduiſed him to diſtribute this waightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had bene an Aethiopian, it had bene a farre progreſſe for him to haue paſſed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the paſſing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneeth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in thoſe parts: in which the ſecond time he wandered fortie yeares, and did by theſe late traualles of his ſecke to inſtruct the children of Iſrael in the knowledge of one true God, before hee brought 20 them to the land of plentie and reſt. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatrie, and obſtinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that thoſe ſtiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perſuaſion or by miracle, he waſted them out in the deſerts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thoſe hee might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne deſire, and Gods Commandements.

Laſtly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Auguſtinus Chriſmaenſis, where alſo he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne wordes haue this beginning. Mentitur etiam APOLLINARIS duas uxores habuiſſe MOSEN, &c. APOLLINARIS alſo lyeth in affirming 30 that MOSES had two wiues: and who doth not perceiue theſe things fauied by them? for it is maniſeſt that the wife of MOSES was ZEPHORA, daughter to the Prielt or Preſident of Midian: and that Midian cannot bee taken for Aethiopia beyond Egypt; being the ſame that ioyneeth to Arabia: ſo ſaith Chriſmaenſis.

†. III.

CHVSH ill expounded for Aethiopia, EZECH. 29. 10.

NOW as Chuiſh is by the Septuagint conuerted Aethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Aethioſiſſa: ſo in the conqueſt of Nabuchodonosor is Aethiopia written for Arabia. For by the wordes of Ezechiel it is maniſeſt that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Aethiopia. Behold (ſaith Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the perſon of this great Aſſyrian) I come vpon thee and vpon thy Riuer, and I will make the land of Egypt utterly waſt and deſolate, from the Tower of Seneneh, euen to the borders of the Black-moores: which laſt wordes ſhould haue bene thus conuerted: From the Tower of Seneneh to the borders of the Chuiſtes or Arabians: betweene which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seneneh to the Aethiopians, hath no ſenſe at all. Seneneh it ſelfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Aethiopia, or the land of the Black-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonosor conqueſt had bene but between 50 Seneneh and the border of Aethiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſſe no other victorie then the conqueſt of all that land and Countrey, lying betweene Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies ioyne together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſenſe with the former, if any man ſought to expreſſe by theſe two bounds, the conqueſt of England.

England: Barnwick being the North border of England, as Seuene or Syene is the South bound of Aegypt, seated in Thebaide which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entered into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect, haue written Ethiopia for Chus.

†. IIII.

An other place of Ezechiel. c. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted. In the illa egredientur nuncij a facie mea in trieribus ad conuerendam Ethiopia. confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans. in that day shall there messengers goe forth from mee in ships to make the careless Moors afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word trieres for tirremes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the translation should haue bene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chus, or Arabia for Ethiopia or the black Moors, euery man may see which meanly vnderstandeth the Geography of the world, knowing, that to passe out of Aegypt into Ethiopia there neede no gallies nor ships, no more then to passe out of Northampton into Leicester: Ethiopia being the conterminat Region with Aegypt, and not diuided so much as by a riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Aegypt Nabuchodonosor should send gallies alongst the coast of the Red sea, by which an Army might bee transported into Arabia the happy and the stony (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Aegypt and the deserts of Pharan) which Army might thereby surpriseth them vnawares in their security and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seuene within a mile of Ethiopia, hee neede neither Galley nor Shippe to passe into it: beeing all one large and firme land with Aegypt, and no otherwise parted from it, then one Inland shire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancy to haue rowed vp the riuer but for pleasure, hee could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and steepy mountaines) called Catadupa Nilus were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselves as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse; Iauan and his sonnes in Greece and the Islands adioyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the sonnes and Grand-children of Chus by the riuer of Gehon (their fathers first seat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other: continuat vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any warre, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian blacke moores, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradise.

†. V.

A Place Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chus for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembred, so in diuers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chus, which puts the story (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square, one kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of Scripture Esay 18. Ve terra Cymbalorum alarum quae est trans flumina Ethiopia, or according to the Septuagint in these words. Ve terra nauium alarum quae est trans flumina Ethiopia? Wo to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the riuer of Ethiopia, sending Ambassadors by sea, euen in vessels of reeds vpon the waters. Ve terra ambrosiora: Wo to the land of the shadowe cast, saith Iuuius. The former translators vnderstand it in this sense. That the waters are shadowed with the sailes, which are significantly called the wings of the ships, the other, that the Coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the land.

But to the purpose: That this land heere spoken of by the Prophet Esay is Aegypt no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Aegyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Esay repeateth, and by the former translation euery man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for heereby Aegypt is transported vnto the other side of Ethiopia, and Ethiopia set next vnto Iudea, when it is the land of Chus and Arabia indeede that lieth between Iudea and Aegypt, and not Ethiopia, which is seated vnder the Aequinoctiall line. And of this Beroldus asketh a matterli question (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the riuers of Ethiopia: Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit. For it cannot bee said that he treateth of an unknowne region. Now if Ethiopia it selfe be vnder the Aequinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations farre beyond it again, and beyond the riuers of Ethiopia? except wee shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spake hee knew not what, or vsed an impertinent discoure of those nations, which were not discovered in 2000. yeares after, inhabiting as farre south as the Cape of good hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both TEREKHA in the story of SENACHERIB, and ZERA in the story of ASA are vndoubtedly made *Ethiopian*s.

And by this translation is the story of Senacherib vtterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repulged at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudea: when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhake, (which all the interpreters call King of Ethiopia) was on the way to set on him, he beganne to withdraw himselfe: and fearing to leaue his Army in two parts, he sent threagour messengers to Ezechia King of Iuda perswading him to submit himselfe: the tenour whereof is set downe in the second of Kings in these words. Huue any of the Gods of the Nations deliuered his land out of the hands of the King of Assur? Where is the God of Hamah? &c. By which proud Ambassage, if he had obtained entrance into Hierusalem, hee then meant to haue invited that great Army before Hierusalem commanded by Rabsakeb with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already maistered the most part of all those Cities in Iudea and Beniamin with a third Armie, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumour of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirrhakeb (whom Iosephus calls Tharshies) Rabsakeb hasted from the siege of Hierusalem and found Senacherib departed from Lachis and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthereopolis, as some haue supposed. But while hee had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeb, God himselfe whom he least feared strooke his Army before Hierusalem by the Angell of his power, so as 185000. were found dead in the place as in the life of Ezechias is heereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Tirrahakeb was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plaine. For he confesseth in the tenth booke the first Chapter of the Iewes antiquities, that it was come to *Senacherib*s knowledge, that the Army which was a boote (both to relieue the Aegyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now the Desert which lay indifferent betwene Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur which also toucheth on the three Arabias, to wit the stony, of which it is a part: the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeede deede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But, that there is any Desert betweene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For hereth the word (Chusis) is also translated Ethiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth verse. Hee heard also men say of T H I R R H A K E H King of Ethiopia, &c. whereas it should haue beene thus conuerted with Iunius. Audians autem de T H I R R H A K E H Rege Chusis, He heard also of T H I R R H A K E H King of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whose houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very smoke of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their nearest neighbours: and so were not the Ethiopian Black-Moores vnder the Aequinoctial, whom neither warre nor peace (which discourseth all Regions) cuer found out, faith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Ethiopia then Zerah was, who invaded Asa King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million and 3000. Charriots. Indeece, how such an Armie and those Charriots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to runne through them; neither was there cuer any such strength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the world, or elsewhere. Neither are these *Ethiopian*s such traualers or conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Ethiopia. But the word Chusis being first conuerted for Ethiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seates of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

†. VII.

A farther exposition of the place. ESAI. 18. 1.

Concerning these wordes in that eighteenth Chapter of Esaie, Nasium alarum, 30 winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) sailes whistling in the windes, or terra vmbrosa ora (after Iunius) the land of a shadowed coast, or the land shadowing with wings, as our English Genea hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and St. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we vse to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that they wanteth wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worne or too narrow; and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sailes were said to giue a shadow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Esaie) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signifie both to shadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline found: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this. Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doest promise to others safeguard, vnder the shadow of thy wings, which (indeede) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Esaie: and this phrase is often elsewhere vsed, as in the sixteenth Psalm, Sub vmbra alarum tuarum protegemur, T. e. send me vnder the shadow of thy wings. The Boats of reede spoken of are of two kinds; either of basket, willow couered with hides (as anciently in Britaine for a tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the Sonnes of HAM, were seated in order, one by another.

The second Sonne of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chusis first possesse Chaldea on the West side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as hee increased in people, so hee entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the Southeast-side of Iudaea. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palastina: and these foure brothers possesse all that tract of land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as farre to the West as the Mediterran Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petraa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samarita, and Iudaea; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterran Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it selfe toward the South as farre as Syene, the border of the *Ethiopian*s or Black-Moores. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other nation or familie that dwelt betweene them. And in the same manner did all their sonnes againe, and all the sonnes of the rest of *Noah*s children, sort themselves.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt beganne to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeares, which made their antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

This flourishing Kingdome possesse by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Egyptus (otherwise Ramesse, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus chased thence his elder brother Danau, thrusting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made *Dana*i, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeares after the flood, in the time of Iosus, as S. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in *Homer*s Odysses it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oecana, Aria, Ostriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbred all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. yeares. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeares after Iosus, and about 1000. yeares after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israell to be those Hyfeso, which he also calleth Pissores or Sheep-herds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeares: whom also he calleth his Ancesters, (meaning the Ancesters of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israellites had no such Dominion as Manethon saith: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeares.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and and that they had memorie and storie of 13000. yeares; and that the starres had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirme that they are more ancient then Jupiter and the Moone, whereof Ovid:

De Fall. I.

Anle Ionem genitum terras habuisse scruntur Arcades: & Lunâ gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moone did shine, or loue was bred.

But for those 13000. yeares it may well bee true: seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeares by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. yeares, whether wee take their Moneths or Lunatic yeares to haue bene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those five diuerstities of their Lunatic yeares.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

GERARDVS MERCATOR in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the other fiftene reached the creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer. That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeares after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shep-herds Dynastie (being in number the 17) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to haue bene in the yeare of the world 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastie was begunne but in the 292. yeare after the flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeares. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynastie to endure 115. yeares, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeares: for the 28. had but 6. yeares; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeares.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeares: and that the first of the 15. beganne but in the 131. yeare after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to haue bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of fallshood cannot bee hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131. yeare that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinar: so hee forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italie, and Tubal into Spaine, in the 10. yeare of Nimrods raigne: (which was ten yeares after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vniuersal. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a gouernment established in the very first yeare of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neare in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

†. IIII.

†. IIII.

Against PERERIVS: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeares after the creation; at lesse, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquitie of the Egyptians, touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not finde any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either vnlikely or impossible that Egypt should bee peopled within 100. or 200. yeares after Adam, in the first age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall flood, I doe verily beleue the contrarie: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the world was then peopled: Pererius his wordes are these. Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos ADAMI proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Aegyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of ADAM be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeares of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our fauouring beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to bee guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauelling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of union, then out of froward subtiltie, and preiudicate resolute-nesse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First, therefore to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the flood, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the flood double, and (after a few yeares) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue bene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne if- sues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it be ga- thered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes, as suf- ficed to build the Citie and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was gi- uen but 130. yeares by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeare: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, euen within 130. yeares, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeares af- ter (that is, by such time as the world had stood 200. yeares) aswell Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be posselt before the flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance, or true storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeares after the flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that e- uer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those mul- titudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and since left not all her Kingdomes emptye) doe well proue, that if the world had such plentie of people in so few yeares after the flood, it might also bee as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeares after the flood of Noah. And these troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the flood to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. yeares: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but the one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. footmen, and 500000. horsemen, it must needs bee, that long before Semiramis raigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if wee may beleue Trogus Pompeius (Epitamis by Iustine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne wordes, speaking of Ninus. *Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus VEXORIS Rex Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient VEXORIS King of Egypt, and TANAIS King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the world was, the conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbred the Armie, wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. footmen, and 200000. horsemen: and the storics generally shew, that though Zoroasters Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the world euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke forraine authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possesst by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultivate a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and pollicies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must bee inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeares after the flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the flood: for so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeares after the generall flood; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Seybia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those nations be compressed, which 1656. yeares brought forth before the flood? euen necessitie, which cannot bee resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne world; especially, where Death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.*

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of PERERVS.

For what a strange increase did the long liues of the first age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeares. Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the world could not containe them, rather then that they were not spread ouer the world. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this age of the world: wherein if one exceede 50. yeares, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people;

people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industrie of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of foules had the first ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeares, as aforesaid. These numbers, I say, cannot bee counted nor conceiued. For it would come to the time reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeares before the Norman Conquest (sauiug such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mightie ones of the first age obserued no law of matrimonie) it is to be thought that those louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberrall time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flee from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men carelesse of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and discases, which this enuious old age of the world mingleth together, and soweth with the seedes of mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Ammius may be alleged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was located neare Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could bee left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeares. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Ammius his Comment bee very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to bee reiected. Therefore St. Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule. Benz eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria, Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mightie Men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall world: and though that phrase (of all the world) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts. That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Iewes, men that feared God of euery Nation vnder heaven: yet by wordes which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his wordes and sense were the same: for hee addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the world among his sonnes at aduicement, or left them as discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had bene inhabited. And it cannot be denyed that the earth was more passable and easie to traualle ouer before the flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth that Attica (by reason of mudde and slime which the water left vpon the earth) was vninhabited 200. yeares after Ogyges flood; whereby wee may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries after the generall deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) inclosed for 100. or 130. yeares together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first age then after the generall ouerflowing.

¶. VI.

of the wordes of MOSES, GEN. IO. V. ultima, whereupon PERERIUS grounded his opinion.

LASTly, whereas Pererius draws this argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis. And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium, By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the flood; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: the text it selfe rather teaching the contrarie: for out of these (saith MOSES) were the Nations divided in the earth after the flood; inferring, that before the flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the flood, or to any plantation or diuision in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be diuided after the flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessarie diuision controule the planting of the world before it? And whereas it is alleaged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion, it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had neuer bene built, nor any confusion of languages at all, yet increase of people and time would haue enforced a farther-off and generall plantation: as Berofus saies well, that when mankind were exceedingly multiplied, ad comparandam nouam sedes necessitas compellerebat. They were driven by necessity to seeke new habitations. For wee finde (as is before said) that within 300. yeares after the flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Syria, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Libya being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleue Berofus, then not only those parts of the world, but (within 140. yeares after the flood) Spaine, Italie, 30 and France were also planted: much more then may wee thinke, that within 1656. yeares before the flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the world was ouerflowne, there were people in all the world which offended.

¶. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities: with somewhat of PERIUS (another Sonne of HAM) which peopled Libya.

THEREfore, for the Antiquitie of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which giue too much credit to the Egyptians antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceit it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the flood, and 200. or 300. yeares, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some monuments (in Pillers or Altars of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians hauing added to the list and rolle of their Kings after the flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glorie, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memorie of antiquitie was in such sort persuered, Berofus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeare before Alexanders conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree agree and reach to the time of Enos, who was borne 1034. yeares before the flood, and wrote of the worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christs comming in iudgement, as St. Iude hath witnessed. But leauing these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and euery man to his owne reason, I will conclude this plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferior Egypt; surnamed alio Delta: because the feuerall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the Riuer, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ranne toward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Deserts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yeeled it selfe to the salt water towards the North-west, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betwene Memphis and Syene neare Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. gates: and therefore called Cinitas centum portarum; and by the Greekes Diopoliis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus calls Egypt Mesin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebas.

Ioseph. l. i. Ant. cap. 7.
Herod. Euterpe.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya: whose people were anciently called Phutis; (sayth Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the riuer Fut in Mauritania: which riuer from the mountain Atlas (knowne to the inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to bedilant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chus, and Lud were contermini and associates with the Egyptians.

¶. XII.

Of the eleuen Sonnes of CANAAN, the fourth sonne of HAM.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen Sonnes.

CANAAN (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romanes Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilee, Samaria, and Iudaea; in the latter times knowne by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limites whereof are preciselie set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar vntill Azubah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorh, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Lasha. Now howsoeuer these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East, and the other Cities named flood on the frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vttermoost territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrie, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Cethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebusius.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgasi or Girgeseus.
6. Hewi or Chineus.
7. Arki or Harkus.
8. Seni or Sinaus.
9. Aradi or Aradeus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus
11. Hamathi or Hamathus, or Chanathaus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hewites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of ZIDON and HETH.

ZIDON the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asher: for Asher, Zabulon, and Neptali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asherites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those feuen principall Nations (commaunders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Hewites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Befor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vtermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Desert of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his posteritie, as farre to the Northeast as Hebron, and Alamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buie the field of Sarabs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That shee was wearie of her life for the daughters of HETH. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

IEIVSUS, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their Citie and the Countie neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basán) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the boundes of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Celestria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their their being in the mountaines of Juda, and in Idumæa neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And herofit came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fiftenth, for the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos; Tet destruido I the Amorite before them, whose heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oaks.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Hewites and Harkites.

THe fift sonne of Canaan was Gergefeus or Gergesin, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptoleme sets the Citie Gerasa, which Iosephus calles Gesera in the territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ disposed the possessed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their coastes: because their swine filled with the euill spirits drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergefeus also built Berytus (sometime Geris) afterward Felix Julia, three miles from the riuer Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romanes held a garrison: and to which Augustus gaue manie large priuiledges.

Hecus the sixth sonne; and Father of the Hewites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Hewites, howfouer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vtterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israhelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written Iudges the third; They remained to proue ISRAEL by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The feuenth sonne was Araceus or Harki, who betwene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the Citie of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

†. V.

Of Sini and Aradi.

SINEVS the eighth Sonne Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparofa, which Ptoleme finde in Judæa not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptoleme Simyra: Me-la and Plinie Simyris: Brochard Sycan, (called Synachis) neere Arca. Petrus thinkes that Sineus inhabited the Deserts of Sinai or thereabout; but herof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who rooke vew of all these places, affirming that Sineus built Synachis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenai) who descended of Hobab the Sonne of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israhelites in their conduction through the wilderness of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israhelites, and had a portion of Land with the Neptalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei Balaam prophced, that they should be destroyed by the Affyrians.

The ninth Sonne was Aradeus or Aradeus, who in the Isle of Aradu built the Citie Arados: opposite against which Island on the maine of Phœnicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Ile preached the Gospel: and founded a Church in honour of our Ladie: but wee finde no such worke of

of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous; and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrrians. The inhabitants of Zidon and Arad were thy Mariners.

c. 7. v. 8.

†. VI.
OF ZEMARI.

OF Samaricus, or Zemri, the tenth Sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some thinke that he first inhabited in Celestria at Edeffa, and founded Samarium, 13 of which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samarajm (of the same Orthographie) vpon the mountaines of Ephraim (saith Beroldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuerteth amisse (saith hee) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samaricus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emisiani, which Plinie calls the Hemisceni, in Celestria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samarita, both the Hebrew Orthographic, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproueth. And he bought the mountaine Samaris or Shemerom of one SHENER, for two talents of silver, and built in the mountaine: and called the name of the Citie which he built, after the name of SHENER, Lord of the mountaine Samarita. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jewes stood vp, they alwaies called themselves Jewes: when it suffered or sank, they then vtterly denyed to be of that Nation or Familie; for at such times as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Affrians; and partly of the naturals.

†. VII.
OF HAMATHI.

THE last of Canaan Sonnes was Hamathicus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (saith Beroldus) of which (the aspiration taken away) the name is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathicus was parent. Iosephus and S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, betwene the mountaine Cassius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Seleucia, of which S. Peter was Bilhop, and in which S. Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroldus supposeth, which standeth betwene Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotia. Yet, indeede, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off, rated from Canaan, then euer any of those Nations stragled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which hee confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betwene it and any part of the land diuided. And if Libanus it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betwene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land. and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnpossessed, reckoneth all mount Libanus towards the Sunne rising from Badag vnder mount Herman, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because Dauid accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not haue done, if that Territory had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great waight. For if the promise which God made be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the mountaine of Herman, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the mountaines, and the Citie in Nephthali should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephthalims, seated on the fourth side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim: which Cittie S. Hierome writes Emath, Iosephus Hamath, others Emathin, or Amathees, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabshakeb vaunteth in the second of Kings. Where is the God of Hamath.

Tobu

Nimrod.

†. I.

That the most of the Sonnes of CHUSH were seated in Arabia the Happie: and of the Sabaans that robbed Iob: and of the Queen that came to SALOMON.

SEBA of Saba was the eldest Sonne of Chush, the eldest Sonne of Ham, to make a difference betwene him and his Nephew Sheba, the Sonne of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Regma after Montanus) his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the Sonne of Regma with an (S) aspirate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma possesse both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as nearest his Father Chush, and the land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia which looketh into the Gulf of Persia; of which Plinie. Sabai Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad vtrique maria portusque gentibus habitant. The Sabaans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mixtione, saith Possellus. To this agreeeth Ptolomie, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the Citie Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also wee may leaue Saba: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomie, because he remembreth a Nation (called Stabei) neare the Persian Sea; and Massabatha which descended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him Rahma) into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who only attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Sebato the border of Ethiopia.

But

But Berosus thinks it strange, that the Saba, which stole away Iob's Cattle, should runne through all Aegypt and all Arabia Petraea, and finde out Iob in Tracenis betweene Palatyna and Calceyria 1200. miles off. Now as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so doe I thinke, that neither the Saba on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth vpon Iob, which fouer Berosus shall take for nearest. But these were the Saba of Arabia the Desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Cittie Saba is seated: the same which Ptolomie calls Saua, now Semifasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desert, came those Magi or Wise-men which worshipped Christ, faith Melchior, whose wordes are these. The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as 10 Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Hapic, as many wise men doe beleue, but out of Sabain Arabia the Desert: which Cittie when my selfe was there was (as I iudged it) called Semifasac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus it appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disioyned with large Deserts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattle, both in respect of the mountaynes, of the lands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts. Vbi nec homines nec bestiae videntur, nec aues, imo nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, alijssimi, asperissimi, ibi herbe there are found neither men nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but only sharpe, and high stone, and craggie mountaines. Berosus and Pererius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visite Salomon, was of the Saba on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that shee was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Adnan or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour might without any farre traualle enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoide tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabia, Raama, or Regma, 30 with his Sonnes Sheba, and Debar, and Sabiera, were all the posselours of Arabia the Hapic and the Desert: only Hanilah and Zimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chus, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabita, there is found of his name the Cittie of Sabbatha or Sabotia in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomie; who withall nameth Sabotia, within the wals whereof there were sometimes found sixtie Temples. Ezechiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradis. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopsians about Meroe, and Saba of the Ethiopsians Asabari, they be not worthe any farther answer then hath already beene giuen: especially seeing these Citties preferring the memorie of the names of Saba and of Sabain in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cush, with little alterations are preserved. In Arabia the Desert is found the Cittie Saba or Saua, (now Semifasac) with the Cittie of Rhegma for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Hapic is found the Cittie of Rhegama, and Rabana, which also keepeth the sound of Rhegma, the Cittie of Saptha or Sipthah, not far from the East coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe citie, in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai: and to the south thereof againe toward the frowther entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hanilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might passe by boat

10 AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S<sup>t</sup> Hierome followeth, as not curious heron) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. verse, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22. verses to be the merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba the habitation of his father and brother) about 4000. miles. Besides which the Merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-mores. For they of Dedan (faith Ezechiel) were thy merchants in pretious clothes for thy charriots; and these Westerne Ethiopsians neuer saw cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coastes traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, some 20 Gold and Amber, Cuert cattes, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or iron cheely.

But in those daies the West part of Africa within the body of the land was known only by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone was held vnhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Lima, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chus, which seates they held by that name in the time of Heremie the Prophet let vs heare Heremie his own words. Hee see inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of ESAV vpon him. 30 Heereby it appeareth that Dedan was a neighbour to the Idumaeans: and Idumaea is a Province of Arabia Petraea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyned in that part to Petrea, the seat of his Grand-father Chus, which neigbor-hood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumaeans is also confirmed by Ezechiel. Ezech. 25. 15. I will stretch out mine hand vpon Edom, and destroy Man and Cass out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of MIZRAIM: and of the place of HEREMIE Chap.

9. Verſ. 7.

AFTER Chus it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (faith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim the eldest sonne of Mizraim was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his brothers disperſed themſelues into all Regions adioyning. Among the Sonnes of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim Ludin: and yet these names and nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference 50 both of names and nations. For that Ludin the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that hee was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Heremie, who ioyneth them in this sort together. Come ye ye Horse, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joyned together. Æthiopia (or Chus) Ezechiel c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sonnes of Chus; (which were the Chusites) the Sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians, (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Ægypt and Africa shall fall together. Hieronymus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrew called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat nearer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing is, not Lybies, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Cittie (saith he) betwene Ægypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Cittie of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Cittie which was afterward Tiropolis, in which S. Peter cured Aeneas of the palsy) standeth neare the Torrent Gaze, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this Cittie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Citties of one name founded in all the Regions of the world, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Selenus, and Antiochus, many Citties called Alexandria, Selenia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lebaim to be the Father of Lyba who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Positellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's Sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Casubim and Caphorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casubim inhabited Casotis, a region lying in the entrance of Ægypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis and the mountaine Casius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphorim seated neare Casubim in that Tract of Ægypt called Sethroitis, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethroitis; Stephanus and Plinie Sethroites, of the Cittie Sethron: which Orelus takes to be the same which Ptolomie calls Hercules parus. Of the Casubim and Caphorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophylis (which is) Alienigenæ, strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Ægypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) doe not vse the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph). Their principall Citties were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasai, Ascalonites, Azotij, Gethai, and Accaronites. Isidore affirms that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Cittie the Countie adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeede at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these wordes. Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims into Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successours called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Phigirma (otherwise Casarea Palestina or Tyrris Stratonius) which was the fourth border of Phœnicia, to Gaza or to the River of Ægypt. The Anaks or strong Giants were of these Philistims: and Goliath was of Geth one of the five Citties aboue named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Liranus. They mastered the Israelites at severall times about 150. yeares, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by DAVID, and layed on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Citties and the Countie adioyning were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iesus, yet at the time of the promise it was posselt by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Heuteis dwelt in the Villages vnder Gaza. And what meruaile if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth. The Lord will destroy the Philistims, the remnant of the issue of Caphor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphorim; haue not I brought vp ISRAEL out of the land of Ægypt, and the Philistims from Caphor, and ARAM from Kir? So I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Fulgur hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Cittie directly West from Ægypt, betwene Ptolomais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Genea. But Pererius calls Caphorim Cappadocia according to the Fulgur translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethroites, or Cappadocia of Palestina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner hee may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglathphalaser King of the Assyrians carryed away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seems to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media superior: for it was the manner and pollicie of the Assyrians to transplante the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof so it came that Kir was called Syro-media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saying that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Nimrod) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the world were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud, (saying India) which Ibeleuee Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ioctan afterward repaired. His filij Sem ab Euphrate fluuij partem Asiae usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenebant, These sonnes of SEM (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Iosephus and 1. c. 7 Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Acts the 2. v. the 9. and the Princes of Persia, which name then beganne to bee out of vyle and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel). And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it I was in the Palace of S. V. SAN, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Eulais (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel, Plai: and seated in the border of Susima.

C. 8. v. 3.
Prot. Asia. ch. 5.
Dan. 8. v.

Assur (as most Historians beleue) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who displaying the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nine, of equal beaurtie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place dispute that opinion. Every mans hand hath bene in this Story, and therefore I shall not neede herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often inuaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion: yet was not the State of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire: For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullst Princes among them, had yet the mountaine Taurus for the vtmost of his Dominion toward the North-east; and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding those vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Hane the Gods of the Nations deliuered them whom my Fathers haue destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the Children of Eden which were at Telassar. Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Cittie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iub? All these were indeede but petty Kings of Citties, and small Countries; as Herae in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturae vnder Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Aegypti had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because hee established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable storie of the world taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith S. Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must bee those Chaldeans about Yr: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that hee was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud the fourth Sonne of Shem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

¶ II.

Of ARAM, and his sonnes.

ARAM the first and last Sonne of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damasus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrius (saith Eusebius out of Iosephus) which Syrius liued before Moses was borne; in the same which others call the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria had the name of Aram Naharaym, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum fluuioium, Syria compassed with two Rivers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of BETHUEL thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramet, as these his owne wordes conuerued witnesseth. Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant, Those which we call Syrians (saith he) theymselfes call Aramenians and Arameans.

Gen. 28. a. See
Gen. 31. 10. Also Deuter. 23. 4.
Iudg. 31.
Psalm. 7. 19.
Plalm. 59.
Strabo. l. 11.

Against this opinion that Aram the sonne of Sem, was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of those in Syria inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade Gen. 22. 21. Kemuel, the father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall reade Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuels posteritie could bee famous) wee finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Naharaym, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinks in his note vpon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie calls Ancobartus (so called from the River Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharaym (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Riueres (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Citties in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

40 The Sonnes of ARAM were { Vz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and Mefchor Mes.

Vz or Hus inhabited about Damasus, and built that Citie, saith Iosephus and Saint Hierome. But *Toilat*us misliking this opinion, both in them and in Lzra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abraham Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neare vnto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea or Tracemitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie.

Hus therefore is seated beyond Iorday, in the East Region of Tracemitis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the mountaine Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damasus North, and Iordan West: hauing in it many Citties and people, as may also bee gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus.*

In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (saith S<sup>r</sup>. Hierome) and married Dina the daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hul the second Sonne of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Geher the third Sonne, parent to the Armenians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I doe not disprove, though I see no reason why Geher should leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom hee writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Ptolome setteth the Cittie of Chelle.

Geher (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carry them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies 10 keepe the rule of neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Geher seated himselfe neare his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassiotus, and Seleucis, where Ptolome placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Meshe the North part of Syria, betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neare the mountaine Mafius. The certainty of those plantations can no otherwise be knowne then by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neither then when the world was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeares after: and therefore there 20 is no reason to cast them into the desert parts of the world, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sonnes of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince a part, and to themselves; giuing to the Citties therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their memorie to their posteritie: the vse of letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdayning the greatnesse of other, as they are 30 thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsiō, and destruction: so as (Noua Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessable to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes the fourth Sonne is made the parent of the Maeonians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphaxad the third Sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Ischan: and in Phaleg time was the earth diuided.

Chap. 8. §. 7.

† III.

Of the diuision of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sonnes of Heber, of the issue of SEM.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phaleg's birth) were then liuing, and the through plantation of all the East part of the world (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the earth were diuided at either. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of Sealar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeare after the flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeares, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeares after the flood, ere the children of Noah leuered themselves. But 50 to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeares as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the familie of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeares, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more more is it likely, that so soone after the flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God. Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israhel were 70. and had 215. yeares time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg tooke that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and S<sup>r</sup>. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the yeare, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeares before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeares after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeares: in the 43. yeare of whose raigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus beganne to rule the Assyrians 80. yeares before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then wast the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Ariceur King of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis prestant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Citties in Armenia; receiued Barzanis into grace; then 20 inuaded Media; and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his wife and seuen children; vanquished all those Regions betwene Nilus and Tanis, the Aegyptians, Phenicians, the Kingdomes of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Euxycanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoraster and others: and Zoraster on the other side, who made resistance with foure hundred thousand, proue it sufficiently that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they sought to be Masters of all; and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramus: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant 30 that the earth could be filled euery where at the instant, but by times and degrees: And surely whatsoeuer mens opinions haue bene herein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeare 101. after the flood, which was the yeare that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or 10. yeares after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now if it bee objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene giuen him at 40 the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israhel after he had wrestled with the angell; Abraham was first Abraha, and Edom Esaus; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly whereas the Hebrewes S. Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, he foretold the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this prophesie (if any such had bene) might 50 also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwarde fell among the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, by which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proofe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (where-vpon Phaleg tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous

†. IIII.

Of the sonnes of IOCTAN, the other sonne of HEBER.

The sonnes of IOctan were

1. Elmodad.
2. Sa'eph, or Selep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iarab, or Ierath.
5. Haderam.
6. Vzal, or Vzal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Haulia, or Chawila, and
13. Iobab.

ALL those sonnes of IOctan (according to St. Hierome) dwelled in the East partes of the world, or India, euen from the riuer Copbe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sonnes cannot bee gathered out of the Scriptures, the wordes of Moses being generall. And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest vnto Sephar a mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were only three memorabable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauliab. Concerning whose names to auoide confusion it is to bee obserued, that among the Sonnes of Chus, two of them had also the names of Seba and Hauliab. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chus, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, wee haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauliab the sonne of Chus vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabaeans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention. Primum Sabai; post hos sunt Passagarda, prope vero hos sunt Tasci, The first are Sabaeans: after these be Passagarda; and neare these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which ABRAHAM had, ABRAHAM gaue gifts, and sent them away from ISAAC his sonne (while he yet liued) Eastward to the East Countrie: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East Countrie in respect of India; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sunne-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams Sonnes seated themselves on the borders of India, I rather choose to leaue Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Ptolomeus setteth a Cittie of that name.

But Saba the sonne of IOctan, the sonne of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the world) which he wrote in Greeke verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabai. Taxilus hor inter medios habitatus, sabans, In the midst of these dwell the Sabai, and the Taxili, saith this Dionysius.

Of OPHIR one of IOCTANS sonnes and of PERU and of that voyage of SALOMON

OPHIR also was an inhabitant of the East India, and as (St. Hierome vnderstandit) in one of the Ilandes plentifull of gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Iosephus vnderstandes Ophir to bee one of those great head-landes in India, which by a general name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut, and Malacca. Ptolemy takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierome doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arius Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third chapter and sixt verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The wordes in the second of the Chronicles are these, And hee ouerlaid the house with precious stones for beantie; and the gold was gold of Parauaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauliab, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a towne in Characene a Prouince of Susiana Gen. 2. 11 & 12. called Babelus, so called (as he thinkes) by corruption for Parauaim: from whence those Kinges subiected by David brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the Temple. Plin. 6. 2. 28.

But this fancie of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may bee a subiect of no farther dispute; it is very true, that there is no Region in the world of that name: sure I am that at least America hath none, no not any Cittie, Village, or mountaine so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those landes to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches and Dominion inferiour to none) some of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Countrie, and pointing with their hand athwart a riuer, or torrent, or brooke that ran by, the Indians answered Peru which was either the name of that brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprize, and so in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since as diuers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Aesop the Iesuite in his naturall and morall Historie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of IOctan, who as hee supposeth nauigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Iucatan, is nothing else in the language of that Countrie, but [What is that] or [What say you] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) What aske you, or what say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountainous Countrie on the South side of Trinidad and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hilles as farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as high hilles or mountaines. For as Paria begins that meruallous ledge of mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from 8. degrees 50 of North latitude to 52. of South; and so hath that Countrie euer since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Countrie, one of the Saluages answered Wingandaton, which is as much to say, as, you weare good good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trimaado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that felse place which the Sea compassed, they answered Caeri, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner haue many places newly discouered bene intituled: of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leaue Ophir among the Moluccas whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it felse (towards Persia) in Haulah, now Susana, and all along that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plentie is taken vp at the Philippines, certaine Islands planted by the Spaniards from the West India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeares in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the vttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugall, or from hence, finish that nauigation in two yeare, and sometimes lesse: and Salomons ships went not about a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they euermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compass was knowne, it was impossible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bene for the plentie of gold in the East India Islands, farre about the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeare from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manilla. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worke: neither could hee nauigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to haue guided him:

Tositatus also gathereth a fantastical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countie, whose mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which mountaines Salinus affirmeth to be in Syria Asiatica, in these wordes. Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griffes teneant vniuersa, adites ferocissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Counties abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue bene men with one eye only, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes Hierodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flacens: and D. Scudus in the storie of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed was first giuen them by reason that they vied to wear a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Salinus borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gisulitren, or the Caue of the Northeast winde. For therest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins recieue this Morall. That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this world, had their perfect senses, and were not deprivied of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be faigned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the world, where wild beasts or Serpents defend mountaines of gold, it might be auowed: For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable mountaines which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited only with Tigers, Lyons, and other rauinous and cruell beasts: into which if any man ascend (except his strength bee very great) hee shall bee sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of gold, gold, or seeke to defend that mettall, but being disquieted, or made afraide of themselves or their young ones, they grow irraged and aducturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegatos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they die for the pearle. And though the Alegatos know not the pearle, yet they finde fauour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

OF HAVILAH the sonne of IOCTAN, who also passed into the East Indies: and of MESHA and SEPHER named in the bordering of the families of IOCTAN: with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Haulah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir pass into the Islands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Haulah, it is meant by Haulah in the East India, which tooke name of Haulah the sonne of Ioctan: but Haulah, which Pison compasseth, was so called of Haulah, the sonne of Chus, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture. SAV I smote the Amalekites from Haulah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul cuer made warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three Saba, Haulah, and Ophir; though at the first seated by their brethren about the Hill Mafius or Mes, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their issues removed into East India, leaving the other families of Ioctan, to fill the Countie of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue bene from Mes vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mes to bee a Region of the East India, and Sephar a mountaine of the same (which mountaine Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mes is that part of the mountaines of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chabor as springeth which runneth by Charan: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Siphara by Ptolomie, standing to the East of the mountaines Mafius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beatic and riches thereof. But this was in processe of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations; contrarie to reason and possibilitie. And that this mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 23. Balaam the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaam brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie.) Because they hired Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria Naharajim, which is Mesopotamia, as afore said.

This plantation of the world after the flood both best agree, (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these bee the reports of reason and probable coniecture; the guides which I haue followed herein, and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies: be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, private; or publicke, other then the discouerie of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many volumes of vntue reports left Honour without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in steade thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkeſt forgetfulneſſe ought to haue buried, and couered ouer for euermore. And although the length and diſſoluing nature of time hath worne out or changed the names and memorie of the worlds firſt planters after the ſound (I meane the greateſt number and moſt part of them) yet all the footſteps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath bene ſpoken) are not quite worne out nor ouergrowne: for Babylon hath to this day the ſound of Babel; Phoenicia hath Zidon, to which Cittie the eldeſt Sonne of Canaan gaue name; ſo hath Cilicia Tharſis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulneſſe ſome ſignes of their firſt Founders and true Parents.

Of the beginning and eſta bliſhing of Gouernement.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt Gouernement vnder the eldeſt of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

It followeth now to entreate how the world beganne to receiue Rule and Gouernement, which (while it had ſcarcitie of people) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitie and Elderſhip. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldeſt of families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwaies vſed both for the Magiſtrate, and for thoſe of age and grauitie: the ſame bearing one ſignification almoſt in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouernours ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the ſame ſenſe, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Iſaia, Then the Aſſembly beleued them as thoſe that were the Elders and Iudges of the people. And ſo in the words of thoſe falſe Iudges and witneſſes to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, ſeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vſeth the ſame word for the Magiſtrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Ca giueth two other reaſons for this appellation: Apud Lacedemonios qui ampliffimum inſiſtrum gerunt, ut ſunt, ſic etiam appellantur Senes, Among the Lacedemonians the cheefe Magiſtrates, as they are, ſo are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio & ſenectus eſt eſſent in ſenectus vultu ſummum Concilium Maiores noſtri appellabant Senatum, If reaſon and aduſement were not in old men, our Anceſtors had neuer called the beſt Counſell by the name of a Senate. But though theſe reaſons may well be giuen, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernours or Counſailers of State, there is a ſigne that the firſt Gouernours were the Fathers of families; and vnder them them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietic, or proper power. The kindes of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium, Proprietie or mastery; the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slave. Ad Cæsarem (saith he): potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietates, Cæsar hath power over all; and every man proprietic in his owne: and againe, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singula dominio, Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice beganne abundantly to increace: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence; which but from excellent feede fel-dome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouerhadowed with pride, and all examples vterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall persuasions (after mankind beganne to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habituall) to constraîne it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and steered by their owne fancies; and tost too and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was seuered from power, and strength from charitie: Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wife and Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become farre more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouerflow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the Mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mightie then themselves: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintancy) proued vpon a better triall; no lesse perilous then an vniudurable bondage.

Necessitas fr-
mum iudicium, & immutabilis providentie po- testas.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Gouvernement, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corollue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approued soueraigne power, be thought themselves of certain equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and weighing in this balance both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Elderhip preceded the rule of Kings: so the will of Kings fore-went the inuentions of lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum prolegibus erant, The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the willes of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to bee good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt, Loue sees one while too much, another while sturke no: thing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few years (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that gouernement which had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an even balance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues only: so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti, Dij & dicti, Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De vno seculo, Part. 1.

And

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to reason and necessity; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and bee preferred without a Ruler and Conduktor: God himselfe by his eternall providence hauing ordaind Kings; and the law of Nature leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the verie Bees haue their Prince; the Decree their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most High beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of men, and appointeth ouer it whomsoever he pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdome, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reigne; by me Princes rule; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings; and that this power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate. Thou couldest haue no power at all against mee, except it weree giuen thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold iustice that the world hath beene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of families gouerned their children, and nephewes, and families, in which gouernement the obedience was called naturall pietie: againe, by a iustice diuine, drawne from the lawes and ordinances of God: and the obedience herunto was called conscience; and lastly by a iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the obedience to this we call dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in general was paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as were Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Governement with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

What other policie was exercised, or state founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplyed before the flood, it cannot bee certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall flood; and very likely, that the cruell oppressions in that age proceeded from some tyrannic in Governement, or from some rougher forme of rule, then the paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the world in those dayes to the Giants of Libanus, who maltred (saith he) all Nations from the Sunne-rising to the Sunne-set. But in the second age of the world, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Governement were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of places and people.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approued, was the Governement of one, ruling by iust lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the keeper of right and equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word. Judges and Officers shall thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Governement is of diuers principall persons established by order, and ruling by lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Governement of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniuersall ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the state, contrarie to their owne lawes and ordinances. These three kinds of Governement are briefly exprest by Tholomaeus; Vnius, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, euery Father, or eldest of the familie, gaue lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplyed into many households (man by nature louing societie) ioyned their Cottages together in one common field or Village, which the Latines call Vici; of the Greeke κωμ, which signifieth a house, or of the word (Vis) because it hath diuers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first house grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke παῖς, which signifieth a fountaine: because many people (hauing their habitations not farre asunder) dranke of one spring or frame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some thinke) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impietie beganne to gather strength, and as emulation and pride betweene the races of the one and the other daylie increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they beganne to ioyne and set together diuers of their Villages, innironing them first with banks and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because wals were opposed against enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safetie and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe, because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis; and that ab eo quod multitudo conuit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie may by turnes become Officers and Magistrats thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of subiects are also knowne. For euery Citizen is also a subiect, but not euery subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no subiect; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken of Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also magisteria, precepts of art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος): and so the Greekes call them Μεγιστανες, whom the Latines call Magistratus or Magistratus.

The office and dutie of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few wordes. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by St. Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finally, (that is) by whom Magistrats and Princes are ordaind, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the minister of God for thy wealth, but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. He also teacheth in the same place, That euery soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordaind; and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not only be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For whosoever must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbered of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted authoritie, by God ordaind and established. Neither ought any subiect therefore therefore

therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or crueltie: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the commandment of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all due to Cesar should be giuen vnto him: and hee payed tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Israelites (euen those that were captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Isaac blessed the King of Egypt. And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saniour (saith Paul) that ye make supplications and prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did St. Chrysostome in his Homilie to the people preferre Monarchicall Gouernement, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should bee wanting: Prestat regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum, Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth. Prestat (saith Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo principe esse, quam sub nullo, It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them. Neque enim libertas tutior vlla est (saith Claudian) quam Domino seruire bono, No libertie (saith he) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howeouer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 1000000. Tyrants: vnder a wile man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Ageslaw answered a Cittizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the gouernement, That kinde of rule which a man would disdayne in his owne houle, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembered) many houholds ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Citties: so when these Citties and Cittizens ioyned together, and established lawes by consent, afflicating themselves vnder one Gouernour and gouernment, they so ioyned were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Gouernement of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the families became strong, and dispersed into leuall parts of the world, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seedes and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and budde. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then fought for no larger Territorie then themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyet, then to maintayne life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicitie of our forefathers, this name may then truly bee call vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may bee doubted. For good and golden Kings make good and golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancie of Empire, (when Princes played their prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might bee called called the golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times bee truly called golden. for be it that men affect honour it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberaltie ouerflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by pollicie and example. But Age and Time doe not only harden and shrinke the openest and most social hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there bee no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times inuious and yron. And as this falleth out in the raigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes bee many: for our younger yeares are our golden Age; which being catcht vp by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grievous alterations in our felices, and the paines and diffeases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing: especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adordeth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust focuer. Fit humanae malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, praesentia in fastidio sint, It comes to passe (saith Tacitus in Dial. de Orat. citius) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwaies extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward age. Quod sint laudatores temporis acti, That they are praisers of forepassed times, forgetting this aduise of Salomon. Say Eccles. 3. not then why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca. Maiores nostri quicquid sunt, et nos querimus, posteri queruntur, euos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum, et in omne nefas labi, Our Ancesters haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth raigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius. Non res quandoq. vetus

30 fact, et vetus temporibus quibus caput noua fuit et repentina, What focuer is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made golden, this wee may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crownes: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of subiects to Princes: so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subiects; hauing respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but euen to the meaneit of his Creatures. Nunquam 40 particulari bono seruit omne bonum, The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and the great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs; and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For Potestas humana radicitur in voluntatibus hominum, All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

Vetus nobilitas non nascitur
sed fit.

And with this supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie beganne also other degrees and differences among subiects. For Princes made election of others by the same rule, by which themselves were chosen; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which employments and offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from age to age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the succession of bloud, but to succession of vertue, as hereafter may bee proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glorie or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet heretofore had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue were so called. Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute pra alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deferred Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his posteritie, St. Hierome iudged of the succession in this manner. Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent, I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessitie bound not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobilitie be virtus & antiqua diuitia, Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glorie, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witnessse of vertue and well-doing: and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a race or lineage: then are those in whom vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed papers, which ignorant men worship in steade of Christ, our Ladie, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregges and vices of ancient vertue: Flowers, and hearbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they runne foule, filthie, and defiled? Ex terra ferit productur aliquando cicuti & venosus, & ex terra sterilis pretiosum aurum, Out of fruitfull ground ariseth sometimes poisoning hemlocke: and out of barren soile precious gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charon (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the race and lineage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be vertue, and qualitie profitable to the Commonweale. For hee is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike vertue, seruing his Prince and Countrey, and being defended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selues acquire by our vertue and well deseruings) cannot bee balanced with that which is both naturall by descent, and also personall; yet if vertue bee wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith this Charon) this Honour (to wit) by descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with siluer or fauour: and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kinges with the change of their fancies with they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents, wee should rather know such Nobilitie (without vertue) to be shame and dishonour, then Noblesse, and glorie to vaunt thereof.

What

What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in sinne, of a possibler body and barren minde? for (according to the same Father.) Dele suam fugacis honoris huius, & male coronatam interitum glorie, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glorie, that then thou maist consider thy selfe nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myster, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with silkes, or adorned with feathers, or stufled with gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meete with a naked, and poore, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and a weeping because he is borne, and reining because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

For as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betwene it and dust: which if thou dost not beleene (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchers and Monuments of thy Ancesters, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seeme more Noble and beautifull then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life; not in the fleshly line;
For bloud is brute, but Gentrie is diuine.

Phaser.

And how fouler the custome of the world haue made it good, that Honours be cast by birth vpon vnworthy issues: yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow-Princes. There is an euill (saith he) that I haue seene vnder the Sunne, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Follie is set in great excellencie.

CHAP. X.

Of NIMROD, BELVS, and NINVS: and of memorable thinges about those times.

§. I.

That NIMROD was the first after the flood that reigned like Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authoritie.

THE first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the flood was Nimrod, the Sonne of Cush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to S. Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminencie, and because he was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that he was begotten by Cush, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse wordes calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Cush, other mens coniectures to the contrarie ought to haue no respect. This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannical: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion.

But

But it seemeth to mee that Melanchton conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Authour of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or severe Gouverneur, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authoritie. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mightie hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both beasts and theeves. But S. Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie hunter against God. Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, venator contra Dominum, So is that Giant to be cōsidered, a hunter against the Lord. But howsoever this word (a mightie hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it is no where found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylonia: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeares of his life excepted) in the succeeding storie of the Hebrewes: nor that Sem was in this disobedient troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Ischan were the Capitaines and leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the race of Sem which came into Chaldea were no partners in the vnbeleueing worke of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his issues. In familia Heber remansit hec lingua, In the family of Heber this language remained (saith S. Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this language Abraham vied: yea it was anciently and before the flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cassiodorus) lingua humana: 30 the humane tongue.

We know that Geropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Egyptius, Vergera, and others, is of an other opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolue, that none of the godly seede of Sem were the chiefe leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That NIMROD, BELVS, and NINVS were three distinct persons.

BENZO, and out of him Nauclerus with others make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus; and so doth S. Hierome vpon osee: and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion. Ibi autem NINVS regnabat post mortem patris sui BELI, qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did NINVS reigne after the death of his father BELVS, who first governed in Babylon sixtie five yeares. But it could not be vnknowne to S. Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of NIMROD'S Kingdome (saith he) was BABEL, ERECH, ACCAD, and CHALNE, in the land of Shinar: Wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the world was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authours. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat, who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Caesar ouerthrew the libertie of the Romane Commonwealth, making himselfe a perpetual Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authoritie ouer the Romans, as an Emperour. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Elderhip and paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Petrus is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeares after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one yeare: the one dyed; the other in the same yeare was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is farre more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: 20 but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth that Ninus ouercame and suppresseth the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrary, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seate of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria; whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered againe by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

Dicitur autem

Cōtilibus muris cinxisse SEMIRAMIS VRBEM:

SEMIRAMIS with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose:

Further where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the fame of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might haue beene giuen to many other Kings aswell. For if we may beleue Iustine; then were Ptolemis King of Egypt, and Tanis of Syria mightie Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the wordes of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them. For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages to haue invaded and mastered those Citties so farre remoued from Babel; namely Erech, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus; as a man of the greatest vnderstanding; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue bene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, that euer Nimrod intiaed any of these Citties; but that hee founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

50 Besides, whereas these Citties in many mens opinions are found to stand farre away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beleefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archard, and Epiphanius Arphal: Ninus takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region therabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others vnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to bee one Citie: so doe doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charan; but all mistaken. For Nibis, Accad, and Charan are distinct places. Though I cannot denie Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Acad: and so doe the Hebrews also call Nibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Cittie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech, S. Augustine Oreg, and Pagninus Erec, this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Sassania: but there is also a Cittie in Comagene called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Cittie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Marcellinus. S. Hierome takes it for Selucia, Etioplymitanus for Ctesiphon: others 10 doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Perfians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Citties are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his wordes. And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinar: so as in this Valley of Shinar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Citties farre removed, and in severall Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chaine from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chaine, and from thence goe you to Harnath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneue translate 20 in favour of the former opinion, to set these Citties out of Shinar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinar was here named: not that all these Citties were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt; but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrods Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Cittie at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great Cittie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient Cittie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chaine is situate in the Valley of Shinar, it hath beene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cit- 30 ties from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

§. III.

That NIMROD, not ASSVR, built NINUS: and that it is probable out of ESAY 23. 13. that ASSVR built Vr of the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state, of Babylon and 40 Affria: a controuersie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certaintie. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confule the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort he conuerteth the Hebrew Text. Erat enim principum regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaariz, & terra hac processit in Affria ubi adificauit Ninuen: (which is) For the beginning of this Kingdome, was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of this land into Affria, and built Ninue. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any 50 person, but for the Region of Affria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly the other construction, (where the word (Assur) is taken for Assur the Sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrarie vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth tenth Chapter he setteth downe the Sonnes of Noah in these wordes. Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of NOAH: SEM, HAM, and JAPHETH, into whom Sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately. The Sonnes of JAPHETH were GOMER, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noahs Sonnes, bee hee eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceeds and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his Sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheths eldest sonne; and then speaks of Iaan and his Sonnes: for of the rest of that familie hee is silent. Anon after hee numbrellth the Sonnes of Ham, of which Cush was the eldest: and then the Sonnes of Cush and Miz- 10 ram; and afterward of Canaan; leauing Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the Storie of the Hebrews. But after hee beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Iacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the Sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had beene against order; neither would Moses haue past ouer so slightly the erection of the Affryan Empire, in one of the Sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Sems Sonnes which he most attended. For hee nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sonnes of Cush, because he founded the Babylonian and Affryan Empire: and in the eleuenth Chapter he returnes to speake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named 20 it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as hee did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleuenth he maketh no report of Sem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then hee beginneth with the issue of Sem, which hee continueth to Abraham and J-rael. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Comestor or in his historia Scholastica gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these wordes. Vel intelligendum non est de Assyr filio SEM, &c. sed ASSVR (id est) Regnum Affyriorum inde egressum est: quod tempore SARVG proci ASSVRAM factum est, (which is) Or else it is not to be vnderstood of ASSVR the Sonne of SEM, &c. but ASSVR (that is) the Kingdome of the Affrians) 30 came from thence (videlicet from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of SARVG the great grand-father of ABRAHAM. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first erecter of the Affryan Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true quantum ad initium, respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true quantum ad regni ampliationem, regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Metheus, and Viterbiensis, S. Hierome and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornellius: who saith hee rooke 40 vpon him that name of Assur after hee had beaten the Affrians, as Scipio did of Africanus after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Affria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Os 5. &c. but to helpe the matter he makes Nimrod of the race of Sem, and the sonne of Iari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-Bishop of Mentz in the yeare of Christ 854. an ancient and learned writer, vnderstands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: in which wordes of Moses he giueth this sense. De hac terra Affyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine NINI, BELI filij, Ninum conderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Affrians, who built Ninus the great Cittie, so named of NINVS the sonne of BELVS. On the contrary Caluin obiecteth this place of Esay. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, ASSVR founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness, 50 then which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diuerfity in the translation and vnderstanding; in somuch as Michael de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) palleth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to in-ferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather Tornell. Annal.

Iacri. in Gen. 10.

23. 13.

ther then Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Nimue: contrarie to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar, (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this estate or Citie of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembered: vnto which Cittie, people or estate, hee plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot truit, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that estate, an example vnto those Phenicians, whom in this place hee foretelleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians vterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre, (inuincible, as themselves thought) should also sooner after be ouerturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome. Ecce terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is) Behold the land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or this was no people, after the Geneua) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they dermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these wordes. Et in terra Chaldaeorum, & hac desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood. If thou goe out to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt haue no rest, (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walles fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus. Ecce terra Chaldæim, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius, contriuerunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbor for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Iunius in the place of ships lets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneua, by the Barbarians. But this is vnderdoubt that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) hee maketh choice to note the calamities of those places, Citties, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Citizens from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Græcians vnder the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the world most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradyse) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Yr or Yrebo in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon and Otrix, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now <sup>40</sup> it is stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Yr or Yrebo: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuier and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Yr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Citties which had intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ranne, which passage is now stopt vp. Eius cursum ventus aboleuit (saith NIGER). And Plinie, locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum, <sup>50</sup> Time hath borne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) wee may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terrour of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Yr; and (by Hecateus)

Camerna:

Camerna; by Ptolomie Yrebo: and by the Greeks Chaldaopolis, The Citie of Chaldea: which the Sonnes of Shem vntill Abrahams time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Yr of Chaldea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-sceing commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approved; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuier so furre vp as this Citie of <sup>10</sup> Yr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest; that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachalder, which signifieth desert lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Nurians) addeth that they are of all other people the most saluage; calling them besties omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceived (for any thing that I haue read) that Assur is in this place diuinely taken (as for the sonne of Shem, when he is spoken of as a builder of Yr; and when as a destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Shem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimredians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to proue that the same Assur built Nimue, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except wee will make Assur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of <sup>30</sup> doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; & the first that set vp a Statue to be honoured as God. Now if Assur must bee of that race, and not of the familie of Shem, as he must be if he founded Nimue, then all those which seeke to giue him the honour thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Nimue (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very unworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to <sup>40</sup> Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore bee found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authours, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses, and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, hee looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neare vnto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe; that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which shee only finished: so also Ninus of <sup>50</sup> Nimue. Quam quidem Babylonem posuit instaurare, Shee might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall ourborne by the furie of the Riuier: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus. Is not this great Babel which I haue built?

§. IIIL.

of the acts of NIMROD and BELVS, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transugium; and Julius Africanus surnamed Sturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those foure Cities before remembred, Babel, Erce, Accad, and Chalde: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria; and in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his successours in many yeares after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycus) all these Nations were called Mezopotamies, & sermonis linguarum terrarūq; diuisione. By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeares; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouerflowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his warres or conquests there is no report, other then of his begonne enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose Sonne and Successour Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Ninus; that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begonne.

§. V.

That wee are not to meruaile how so many Kingdomes could bee erected about these times: and of VEXORIS of Agypt, and TANAIS of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the world so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold; (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princeesse liberal and powerful beloweth on her first entertainers many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisdome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding minds of men receiue all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as euery leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of people) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they possit, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankind straggled abroade like beafts in a Desert; but that by a agreement they disposed themselves, and vnderooke to inhabit all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not haue beene possit in many hundreds of yeares after, as then they were;

were; neither did those that were sent, and trauailed farre off (order being the true parent of prosperous success) vndertake so difficult enterprises without a Conduiter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened euery humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enioy the harvest of their owne trauailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne ministers and attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vndertakings and conquests of Ninus (the sonne of Belus) made it apparent: for he found euery where Kings and Monarches, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the warres.

But Nimrod (his grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him soueraignetic and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and successour) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerful to resist his attempts: which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Inghine calls Tanaïs, and should coniecture, that Mizraim had bene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me rightly accounted by the indicius and learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesatrius, that liued certaine ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeares, according to the common account.

See more of this, &c. of this first Part. c. 3. §. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of BELVS, and other names affixe vnto it.

Hence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath bene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Ninus, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrellus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a God: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many learned writers haue obserued, significth the Sunne in the Chaldean tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Senniramus giue that name to their Father, that hee might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a God. And as this title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satrapes: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitie) those voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphegor, Belsheub, and Beelzebub. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine Princeps militie, Chiefe in the warre, though Daniel was so called (saith SVIDAS) ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum, in honour of his expounding secrets. S. Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: and saith, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his Father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyrarus) came Idolatry, and the first vse of Images into the world. Istodor doth interpret Bel by Petus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punic or Carthaginian language it significth

lyr. in syriac. Salom. c. 11. 16 d. 18. c. 11.

Hieron in O. G.
c. 4. 29.

eth God. Glycas makes it an Affryian name properly; and Iosiphus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Prisapus, the God of Gardens; which was also the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jewes expresse the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishti, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was given to Idolls, God both hated it and forbid it. And the vng of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sunne, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tanquam Solis particula. As for the wordes compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belphegon; Belphegon is expounded out of FAGIVS, Dominus specula vel custodia, The Lord of the watch-tower or of the guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpoor, or Baalpoor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudant; and therefore the word ioynd expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the sonne Jupiter, and the grand-child Hercules. SATVRNI dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui urbes condiderunt iussim; primogeniti eorum IOVES & IVNOES; HERCVLES cereropotest eorum fortissimi. The ancientest of Noble families, and Kings which founded Cities, are called SATVRNES, their first borne IYPTERS, and IVNOES; their valiant Nephewes HERCVLES. But this Belus (saith LVIVS) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by the dreames of their antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Egyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colonie to the River of Euphrates there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begonne from BELVS in Babel.

40

As for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Strabo. l. 13. c. 3.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the River (saith he) there are gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which XERXES brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of bricke, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyril against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing: for so hee writes of him (calling him Arbelus) ARBELVS, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: perseverarunt igitur Assyri, & finitima illi gentes sacrificantes ei. ARBELVS,

ARBELVS, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their Subjects with title of Deitie; (or with the name of God) The Affryans therefore and the bordering Nations have persecuted, sacrificing to him. Euen Armas also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idoll-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Iapheth slue him. The Affryans worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus saith Suidas. Neither is it vnlkely but that many among idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship; only in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those wodden and brazen carcasses, when posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidorus speaketh in this manner. Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt, & pro vniuersisq; vita meritis vel magnificentia, colit apud suos post mortem caperunt: sed demonibus persuadentibus quos ibi pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimant: ad ista verò magis excolenda acceperunt Poetarum figmenta. They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be Gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence begonne after his death to be honoured of his owne. But at length (the Devils perswading) they accounted them lesser Gods, whose memories they honoured: and the fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honours of the dead) much more superstitious.

Lact. l. 2. c. 2.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidorus alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie: Gentilitas (saith hee) inuentrix & caput est imaginum, Gentilisme is the inuentresse and ground of images: and Ambrose; Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei, The Gentils adore wood as it were the image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath S. Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith LACTANTIUS) ne religio vana sit, si nihil vident quod adoret, They feare their religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shifit this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wife Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Doultia and Hyperdoultia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not only nowhere warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practicers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilely rooted, as neither the expresse Commandment of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any graven image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remove, weede it, or by feare, or by any perswasions leade the hearts of men from it. For where shall we finde wordes of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heede to your selues (for yee saw no image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you) Horre out of the midst of the fire that yee corrupt not your selues, and make you a graven image, or representation of any figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the booke of Wisdome. That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the worshipping shipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, for you saw no image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Baill, Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua, Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Baill thought it a presumption unlawfull to represent a patterne of the infinite God to our owne thoughts and mindes, how faine doe those men presume that put him under the greazie pensill of a painter, or the rustie axe or other instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and speede this inuention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romanes for a while resisted the crection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeares, observing therein the Law of Numa: who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Grecians (a Nation of all others under the Sunne most deluded by Sathan) set vp the images of their Gods; which (as St. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and vterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth. Simulachra deorum venerant, illis supplicant, genua posito illa adorant, & cum hac suppliciant, fabros quo illa fecere contemnunt. The images of the Gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees; those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffeth at.

Deuili Dei.

*Hon miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa sibi sculptunt simulachra, sumunt, Factorem fugiunt, & que fecere verentur.
Quis furor est? que tanta animos dementaludit?
Vt voluerem, turpemq, bouem, toruuntq, Draconem,
Semi-hominemq, canem supplex homo pronus adoret.*

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should vgly shapies adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuise was barbarous, and first, and many yeares practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Iewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembereth how the Sibyls inuighed against Images: and Hosinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those bables. Strabo and Herodotus witnesseth, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus neuer taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortal natures by mortall figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixt booke de prapratione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same do Tacitus and Crimis report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might be remembered that witnesseth the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hosinian hath written at large in his Tract de origine

imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs oriuntur, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserv'd best of their countries and commonwealthes: Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solebant exprimi nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuam merentium: Men were not wont to make pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papistes, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elemens: lucrarum, vt per ea discerent homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they, and so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of letters, whereby men might learne to know the invisible God: in which vnderstanding (perhaps) they no otherwise esteemed them then pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memorie of Belus the Babylonian became afterwards the most reuerenced Idoll of the world, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stockes and stones, and painted canaues (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding. On these stockes we call (saith the booke of Wisdom) when we passe through the raging waues, on these stockes more rotten then the ship that carrieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of Gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dij Consetes, seu maiorum gentium, selecti, Patrii, insigniores, dij medij: Counselling Gods, or Gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, select Gods, Patrian, Gods of marke, and common Gods (which the Romanes called Medioximi) dij infimi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other Gods: of which St. Augustine hath made large mention in his booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable foules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell moued I know not) erect in the Athenian fields, Altars to the vnkowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them first knowe to whom those Altars belonged, and opened their cies which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth euery man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so many yeares led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these Gods was so great in generall, or that euery Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them; as Iupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athen Minerva, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almost euery familie had a God a-part. For as it is written in the second of kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asihim, and the Ainim made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sephera burnt their children in the fire to Aramlech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esaie derided? Men cut downe trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make roadie their meate, and warme themselves by the fire thereof, and of these idles hee maketh a God, an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heartes from vnderstanding. It is therefore fassit for a Christian to beleue the commandements of God so direct against Idolatrie, to beleue the Prophets, and to beleue Saint Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly. My beloved sic from Idolatrie, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, widge yee what I say.

p. VIII.

Of the warres of NINUS: and lastly of his warre against ZOROASTER.

Nto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commaunded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that iniuriously invaded his neighbour Princes, and the first that without shame or feare committed adultery in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars): so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of 10 prophane Authours) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that peece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Ammianus hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chytraeus noteth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halycarnassus, and others: yet Lodouicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the fragment; prouing directly that it cannot bee the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenaeus and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Asctades, and to the times of Josiah. 20 For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain papers, or some fewe lines of the Chaldaean and Assyrian Monarchies: but hee afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kinges is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Cnidos (a Cittie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the yonger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vpwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Story of Cyrus the yonger Xenophon approueth him in some things, and Athenaeus Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whome hee liued, and so incredible are the numbers 30 which he findes in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoeuer his reportes were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very fewe excerpti- ons lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe ouer the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few wordes as I can expresse them. S. Augustine affirmes that Ninus mattered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wanne it all, saue India, Baetria, and Arabia. For hee made Arius of Arabia the companion of his conquests, with whom he entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commaunded many people and was his kinsman, and a Chusite, and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprise was 40 vpon Syria, which hee might easily subdue, both because hee invaded it on the so- daine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Arius (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, hee forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia hee bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer hee commaunded the lesser Asia, I doe not beleue, for none of his successours had any possession therein.

His third warre was against Pharus, King of the Medes, whom it is said that hee ouerthrow, and cruelly murdered with his seuen children, though others affirme that they all dyed in one battaile against him. Whether hee invaded Zoroaster be- fore the building or amplifying of Ninus, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that he made two expeditions into Baetria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first he returned, and set the worke of Ninus forward: and then a second time entred Baetria with 1700000. foote, and 200000. horse, and 10000. fixe hundred Cha- 50 riots:

riots: being encountered by Zoroaster with 400000. But Ninus preuailling, and Zoroaster slaine, he entred farther into the Countrey, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Baetra or Baetria (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) hee entred and possesse: Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beaurtie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely re- spects) he tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out if hee refused to consent. He therefore yeelding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong perswasions of shame and disho- 10 nour, cast himselfe head-long into the water and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Aubour of Magick arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magike.

p. I.

That ZOROASTER was not CHAM, nor the first inuentor of Astrologic, or of Magike: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

ZOROASTER King of the Baetrians, Vincentius sup- 30 poseth to be Cham, the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probability. For Cham was the paternall An- cestor of Ninus; the father of Chus; the grand father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the father of Ni- nus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuised by some wicked knaue, and so inticuled: of which Sixtus Se- nensis hath made due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue 40 the inuention of Magike to Cham, the sonne of Noah. Cassian. in Olla. col. 1. 1. 1. So did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Art (saith he) with the seuen liberrall Sciences he writ in fourteene pillars: seuen of which were made of brasse, to resist the defacing by the waters of the flood; and seuen of bricke against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuised discourse, which went vnder the title of Prophecia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like vnto this of Comestor. These be Cassianus wordes. CHAM (filius NOAH) qui superstitionibus istis & sacri- legis suis artibus infectus, sciens nullam se posse super his memorabilem librum in Arcam pressus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c. CHAM (the sonne of NOAH) who 50 was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein hee was to remaine with his godly Father, caused the precepts and rules thereof to be grauen in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to haue laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he at- tained vnto: being taken for the inuentor of naturall Magike and other arts; for the corrupter, corrupter, saith Plinie and Istine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities; or first found out the nature of hearbs, stones, and minerals, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which I know not what King of Chaldaea, is also made the Inuentour. I rather thinke that these knowledges were farre more ancient, and left by Nash to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein then any other in that age, if hee exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisdome of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to nature and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, disperfed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and attributed proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdome, (Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things; and reneweth all.

Scaliger in Euclib.

Ioseph. l. 1. ant. c. 4.

Now whether this Zoroaster ouerthrowne by Ninus were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Starres, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if that art had beene inuented by Zoroaster, hee could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, hee might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posterity.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse jangling about the word and art of Magike. Arnobius remembreth foure to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermadorus and Dion seemeth to bee but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldaean and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylus, who liued in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hoistanes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: betwene whom and Cyrus there past 78. yeares. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Peromedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthus or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius make him a Chaldaean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldaean by Nation, though the word (Chaldaean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldaei and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldaean both by nation and profession, it appeareth by his bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldaean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

§. I.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from coniuering, and Witchcraft.

OW for Magike it selfe; which Art (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multireprehendunt, Few vnderstand, and many reprehend: Et sicut canes ignotos semper alarant, As dogges barks at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leauing Ninus for a while) to speake somewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magus) because of Simon Magus: who being indeede, not Magus, but Goez, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vsurped that title. For Magike, Coniuering, and Witcherie are farre differing arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found there after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitiue, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuerfant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the art of Magike is the art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (magus) saith, that the Persians called their Gods magus: whence he addeth that Magus is either magus quis deus or magus quis deus (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken Matt. c. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Piccolominie calleth diuine Magike: and these did the Latines newly intitle sapientes or wise men: For the feare and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wise men the Greekes call Philosophers: the Indians Brachmans: which name they somewhat nearly retaine to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalistes, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differed by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hoistanes, one of the ancient Magicians) vseth these wordes. Et verum Deum meritis maiestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, eius venerationi nouit assistere. Idem demonas prodi terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos. SOSTHENES (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hoistanes) ascribeth the due maiestie to the true God, and acknowledgeeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath deliuered that there are Devils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

His Maiestie also in his first booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenly sciences; but vniuersally so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also right which His Maiestie auoweth, that vnder the name of Magike all other vnlawfull arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Maiestie distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which hee hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magike which His Maiestie condemneth is of that kinde whereof the Deuill is a partie. Daniel in his second Chapter nameth foure kinde of those Wise men: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, & Chaldaei. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophistes: Vatubus and Pagninus Geneethiacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatubus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) diuinarum humanarumq; rerum scientiam profestantes. For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Gracians (that is) men that profess the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the English call them Inchanters; Ninus Magicians; Castalon Coniectors: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The Wise men of Babel.

The

The second fort Magi, Pagani, Iunius, and our English call Astrologers, Hierome and the Septuagint Magicians.

The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierome, Pagani, and the Septuagint Witches, or Posyones; in Iunius Præfagistores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly fo called Venefici, or Posyones; and that indeede there is such a kinde of Malefici, which without any art of Magick or Neceomancie vñ the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischief, His Maieſtie confirmeth in the first chapter of his second booke: speaking also in the fifth chapter of their practise, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of waxe, or clay, or otherwise (as it were sacramentally) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other means bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who tooke vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euent; and this they vaunted to performe by the influences of the Starrs by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magick, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeite the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinde of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starrs into those lower elements.

Philo Iudeus goeth farther, affirming that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the starrs and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. DAMASCEN.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetike and Astronomie, who before *ABRAHAM*s coming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo in defence of Mirandula against Gaspar. ALEXANDER & EvpoLEMON dicunt, quod ABRAHAM sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus Chaldaeos primum, deinde Phenices, demum Egyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docuit, ALEXANDER (saith hee, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and EvpoLEMON affirme that ABRAHAM the holiest and wisest of men did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phenicians, lastly the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centrâ latent, Virtutes hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyranus remembered by St. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians Theſſian: among the Egyptians Hermes: among the Babylonians Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the *Hyperborean*s (as is supposed) Albaris: and the Italians Petrus Aponensis: The Magick which these men professed thus defined. Magia est connexio a viro sapiente agendum per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congener respondentibus, vt inde opera procedant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant. Magicke is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, as in enable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles hee confessed God to be the Creatour of the Vniuersal: he beleeueth of the Trinitie, which he could not inuestigate uestigate by any naturall knowledge: hee speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: aproueth the immortallitie of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Loue, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Pellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster in the Theologie of the Phenicians vñ *Zoroaster*s owne wordes. Itac ad verbum scribit (saith EVSEBIUS) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingentis, expers partium, sibipſi similis, bonorum omnium origo, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina institutum perdoctus, natura perfectus, apiens, facie naturæ vicinus inuentor, &c. Thus writeth ZOROASTER word for word. God the first incorruptible, euerslasting, vngotten, without paris, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inuentour thereof.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders, (to wit) Chafcedim, or Chaldeans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which hee translates Arioni, or Sophisti) Atacaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Posyones; or Gazarim Angures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chafcedim were those which had the name of Chaldeans, which were Astronomers, Hic celorum motus diligentissimè spectant, These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome Magicians, qui de omnium tam diuinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt, Who did discourse of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius crieth the inuention of this art to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith S. Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which hee receiued from his Ancesters.

Atacaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of His Maieſties booke of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hierome) which diuine from the entrails of beasts flaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Angures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction wee may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Pencer truly obserueth, præter religionis Persicæ, vt in populo Dei Leuita studijſſe, vera Philosophia dedit erant: nec quisquam Res Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq. percepisset. The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were giuen to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be king of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis in defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus hath two kinds of Atacick, his owne wordes are these. Et ne quæm moueat præmissa Polychronij & Theophilis testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram vbi ab Origine damnamur, quæ per fœdera cum demonibus inita aut verè aut apperenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad practicam naturalis philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutus naturalium virtutum ad mutuum agendum ac patientium. That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vnderstood that Magick is of two sortes, the one euerie where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by conuents made with Deuils, the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practise part of naturall philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutual application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally. This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his

Commentaries vpon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these fower kinds of wise men formerly remembered, he vseth this distinction; Quos nos barolos; ceteri magi; id est incantatores interpretati sunt, & vicentur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine utuntur & victimis; & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldaeis Genethliacis significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro Maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quique & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; vnde & in nativitate Domini saluatoris ipse primum ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes in sanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum stella desuper ostendente. They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret incantaters, seeme to mee such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that vse blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldaeans I take them to be signified by the name of Coniecturers vpon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldaeans: yea Kings and Princes of that nation doe al that they doe according to the knowledge of this art: whence at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the starre from aboue shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference betweene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some writers affirme that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere factio utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcumque; that he is called a Magician now adays, because having entered league with the devill vseth his helpe to any matter; yet (as our Saviour said of Dimor) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magicke is of the wisdom of nature; other artes which vndergoe that title were invented by the fallhood, subletie and enuie of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certaine ceremonies per malam fidem: by an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitly to applye things that worke to things that suffer. And though by the Jewes, those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Diuines which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mecaphschephim, or Mecaphim; yet had they no other reason, then common custome therein. Consequendo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, Common custome (saith S. Hierome) vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expusice Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Euangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficam, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O non te facillone (saith Cicero) why doubtst thou to vse the name of Magus, a name grations in the Gospell, which doth not signifie a Witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie and profession but only idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ re vera opera naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procuratore demonum naturæ ipsius vel coniungentium, vel commissentium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus huiusmodi si Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprè vocant. The marvellousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these workes have beene done by procurement of Devils ioyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoever sitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magicke, which men call very improperly Necromantie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: for by vnderstanding (saith he) the extremest actiuitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Diuinity of Christ: for otherwise (to vsehis owne words) ignoratis terminis potentie & virtutis rerum naturalium stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia. The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether those very

very workes which Christ did, may not bee done by naturall means: after which he goeth on in this sort. Ideonam hæreticæ, non superstitiõe dixi, sed verissimè & Catholice, per talem Magiam adiunari nos in cognoscenda diuinitate Christi, Therefore I said not heretically, nor superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically; that by such Magicke we are furthered in knowing the diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Jewes and others the enemies of Christians religion, doe impudently and impiously object; that those miracles which Christ wrought were not aboue nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeares fuller of knowledge then any that this latter age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vttermoost of 10 naturas workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held nature therein but as a pencill, and by a power infinitely supreme and diuine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here as in other kinds hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other then diuinorum cultor & interpres, A studious obseruer and expounder of diuine things: and the art it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magicke) no other, quàm naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio, Then the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophie: Certainly then it proceedeth from common ignorance, and no way forth with wise and learned men promiscuè, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawfull and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious; and (to vse 30 S. Paulus wordes) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Deuill hath thrust in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magicke, or the wisdom of nature, because the Deuill (who knoweth more then any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of herbs, drugges, minerals, and excrements: then may wee by the same rule condemne the Physitian, and the Art of healing. For the Deuill also in the Oracles of Amphiaræus, Amphilochus, Thronionius, and the like, taught men in dreames what herbs and drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Deuill from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the ministers and seruants of God, changing himselfe 40 for that purpose into an Angell of light. He hath led men to Idolatrie as a doctrine of religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starres, teaching men to esteeme them as Gods, and not as instruments. And (as Buntings obserueth) it is true, that iudiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heavenly bodies (as euen generally experience sheweth) haue and exercise their operation vpon the inferior. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they haue seuerall and proper names, so haue they seuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He countereth the number of the Starres, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Deuill causeth not to shuffe in his superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, numbers, and incantations; and taught men to beleue in the strength of wordes and letters: (which without faith in God are but inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his owne with the all-powerfull word of God, or to diminish the glorie of Gods creating word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, hee was neuer ignorant, that both the wile and the simple obserue when the Sea-birds forsake the shoares and flie into the land, that commonly some great forme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crowses and bathing of Ducks foreshew raine: for they feele the aire moistened in their quilles. And it is written in Hieremie, 10 ca. 8. ver. 7. Prophet, Euen the Sturke in the aire knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enimie of mankind, working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to obserue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrailes for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnspeakable providence in the liuers and bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by dreames, not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Ioseph, and by dreame informed Isaac, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remem- 20
bered in Iob 33. 17. In dreames and visions of the night when sleepe falleth vpon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprise, therefore, I say, doth the Deuill also practise his diuinations by dreames, or (after Parisenis) diuinitatis imitaciones, his nocte-diuitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne dreames: Mythridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hercot, because all dreames (without distinction of causes) were drawne to diuination, forbad the same by a law; as by the wordes of prohibition (aut narrandis somnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the law of God in Deuteronomie cap. 13. seducing dreamers were ordered to bee slaine. Yet it is not to bee contemned that 30
Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his dreame for two grieuous diseases that oppressed him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomies poisoned wound; nor that which S. Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise, whose sonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the acquittance lay to discharge it; nor that of Alyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for asmuch as the cause is not in our selues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That DANIELS mistaking NABUCHODONOSORS condemning of the Magicians doth not iustifie all their practises.

BUt it may be objected, that if such diuination as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange reuelations: how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such 50
Deut. 13. & 18. Leuit. 24. kinde of people God himselfe commanded to bee slaine. To this diuers answeres may be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldaens, because they acknowledged that the dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any art, either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (saide the Chaldaens) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the euil-living God.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any euill or vnlawfull arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrarie, and called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and Professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had beene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters; 10 of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldaens, others Magi or Wise men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel mistook and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vniuit. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practise of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Deuill himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practise and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by sacrifice; there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer sacrifice to the 30 God of all power, because the Deuill in the image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heauenly bodies; neither can it dehorte wile and learned men in these daies from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The sympathetical and antipathetical working of hearbes, plants, stones, minerals, with their other vmultitudes sometimes taught by the Deuill, and applied by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable endes can neuer, terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the vsing of them to the helpe and comfort 40 of mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Deuill betraierth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of dreames; so farre as with a good faith and a religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lately the prohibition to marke flying of foules (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowses against raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may bee giuen. For if we confound artes with the abuse of them, wee shall not only condemne all honest trades and interchange among men (for there are that deceiue in all professions) 50 but wee shall in a short time burie in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and couer it ouer with a most scornfull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we should shew our selues ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce, Mythakefall we should shew our selues towards those, who with paines and care haue discovered vnto vs light in this light.

Theolog. c. 11.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematices also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort. In speculo mathematico Verum illud, quod in omni sibi quæritur, relict; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate. In the glasse of the Mathematices that truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscure image, but in a cleere and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kinds of enchanfull Magick

IT is true that there are many artes, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of Magick: and esteemed abusively to bee as branches of that tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the graues of the dead, to whom the Deuill himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certainely it, that the immortal soules of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the graues.

A second practise of those men, who pay tribute or are in league with Sathan, is that of coniuring or of raising vp Deuils, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distracted, as they beleeeue that by terrible words they make the Deuill to tremble; that being once impaled in a circle (a circle which cannot keepe out a Mouſe) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great monster. Doubtlesse they forget that the Deuill is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet resolute himselfe, that he can draw the Deuill out of Hell, and terrifie him with a phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Deuils seeme to vſe, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which raise them vp; as His Maiestie in his Booke aforesaid hath excellently taught, That the Deuils obedience is only secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectiue, that is, vpon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Deuils, which inhabit famblicus imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, do no way neede any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardanus mortall Deuils, following the opinion of Rabbi Auornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Deuils liued not aboue a thousand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatise of Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For were it true that the Deuils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when he had lifted him vp in the ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S<sup>t</sup> Peters praier (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prankt at other times vpon his own accord the Deuill played with Theodotus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue bene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Bader, a principall pillar of the Manichean heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest prooff hereof wee see it euery day, that the Deuill leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the gallows, for whom at other times hee maketh ket him selfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in halt to places farre distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (saith S. Paul) God shall Corint. 5. 5. send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transpositions (yet agreeing with their contentions) His Maiestie in the second booke and the fourth chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by vnanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystalls: of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incantatores, qui in vngue & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore. They are foolishly enchamers which will shut up their spirits within their nailes or in glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another art besides the afore mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by sacrifice and inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and Communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kinde of adoration due vnto their Creatour: so seeing they are most free Spirits; there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the Deuill haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures, either by sacrifice, vow, or inforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Sathan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Deuils which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked diuinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the aire, called Atmoetechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeede) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull and bloody, then the Deuill himselfe. And these accursed creatures hauing sold their soules to the Deuill worke two waies; either by the Deuill immediately, or by the art of poisoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and Witches, His Maiestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Deuill.

There is another kinde of petty witcherie (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of beaſts and birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired than *Mahomet*s Dove, which he had vſed to feede with wheate out of his eare: which Dove, when it was hungrie, lighted on *Mahomet*s shoulder, and thrust his bill therein to finde his breake-fast: Mahomet perſwading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the holy Ghost that gaue him aduise. And certainly if Banks had liued in elder times, hee would haue blamed all the inchaunters of the world: for whosoever was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any beaſt as hee did his Horse.

Eccles. li. 6. n. b. 10.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their denues, or killing of them in the holes by inchantments (which the Maryians, a people of Itale practised. Colobros disrupit Marſia cantu, Inchanting Marſia makes the Snakes to burst.) That it hath bene vſed it appeares Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many impostures may bee in this kinde; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be laied in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I finde no other Magick or inchantment, then to draw out a Mouſe with a peece of toſted cheefe.

des of the iust rise to Eternall life, and of the wicked to an Eternall and secul death.

And (besides St Augustine) Insiene Martyr, Hilarius, Tertulian, Athanasius, Chrysostome and others beleived firmly, and taught it: that the soules of men being once seperate from their bodies did not wander on the earth at all. Credere debemus (saith Cyriel) quam a corporibus sanctorum anima abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati diuina commendari. We must beleue when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the Diuine Goodnesse as into the hands of a most deere Father. It then they be in Heauen, the power of the Deuill cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, ab inferno nulla est redemptio, from Hell there is no redemption. 10

There are but two habitations after death; Unum (saith AVGVSTINE) in igne eterno; alterum in regno eterno: the one in eternall fire, the other in Gods eternall kingdom. And though it bee written in Iure Pontificio, that many there are who beleue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Gloss vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous. Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Gloss) They beleue, and they beleue amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath beene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one; hæc oratio a fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est. That speech is framed by the fiend and deception of the Deuill, saith CHRYSOSTOME. Likewise of the same saith Tertulian. Abstrus animam cuiuslibet sancti, nulum Propheta, a demonio credamus extractam. God forbid that wee should thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should bee drawne up againe by a Deuill. 20

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so doe they the wdden images Cherubims: and false brazen Gods are called Gods: and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonick Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, if it bee his de cura pro mortuis agenda confesseth) yet Siracides following the literal sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Deuill would willingly perswade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power, yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust 30 and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (or whosoeuer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion fo to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that hee refused to answer him either by dreames, by Vrim, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceiue, that he would permit the Deuill, or a wicked Witch to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his owne diuine Law to aske counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elsẽ here. Therefore it was the Deuill, and not the soule of a dead bodie, that gaue answer and aduise.

But because Helias and Helizens had raised some from the dead by the power of 40 Godthose Deuils which S. Augustine calleth lucificatores animantium sibi subiectorum, mockers of their owne vassals, calling before their eies a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voices of men, doe also perswade their gracelesse and accursed attendants, that themselves both possesse, and haue power over the soules of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tuam spectantium, numerum cogitantium saith, L. VIVES, The Deuill beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the boundes of the Deuils power, whom if we will not feare, we must feare to sinne. For when hee is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntary vassall: potest ad malum innuere, non potest trahere, saith S. AVGVSTINE, he can allure, but he cannot in force to euill. Such as thinke otherwise may goe into the number remembered by Lutaretius, 50

Of the memorable buildings of NINVS, and of his wife SEMITRIS: and of other of her actes.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by NINVS: and of Babylon
by SEMITRIS.

30

Vt to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertaine. As for the City it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compasse 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walles whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had such a breadth as three chariots might passe on the rampire in front: these walles were garnished with 1500. towers which gaue exceeding beautie to the rest, and a strength no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

*Infin. La. Diod.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the bankes of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nawderus) had the name of Campos, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldaea; and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein shee sought to exceed her husband by farre. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themselves and their people without either Walles or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of woods, briars, bulshments, and waters, to make it the more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in that age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and 50 purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnderaken, gaue that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

¶ II.

Of the end of NINUS: and beginning of SEMIRAMIS reigne.

This he did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had maistr'd Babylonia, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninine, he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. years. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would graunt vnto her the absolute soveraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, speakes of five daies. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greekes, then that it had any truth.

Ellen. li. 7. ex Diodore.

Howsoeuer Ninus came to his ende, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninine in Assyria. Justin reports that Semiramis (the better to inuelt herselfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offense to take on her so great a charge) presented herselfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might bee made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorablen acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vndertaken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninias had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlikely that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeares after by any such subtilty: (for so long she reigned after the death of her Husband:) but it may bee true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous government and vndertakings.

¶ III.

Of SEMIRAMIS parentage, and education, and METAMORPHOSIS of her Mother.

Some writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue bene of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countrey, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascalonitis; of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Deretia, a Curtizan of Ascalon exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Deretia or Deretis the mother of Semiramis was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated seated on the bankes of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly young man she was by him made with child, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conuied away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild beastes) the same was fed by certaine birds, which vsed to feed vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby thereby hope the better to couer her dishonour and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought that from this Deretia the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the Trunck of Dagon, the head being broken of: For so St. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Parabius, Pagninus, and Iunius write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second all being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this City being maritimate (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) vsed all their deuotions to Neptune, and the rest of the pettie Gods which attended him.

¶ II III.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

BVt for her Pedigree I leaue it to the *Assyrian Herald*s: and for her vicious life I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease do more often accompanie licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and bazzard do. And if the one halfe bee true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres made with glorious successe: all but her last enterprize of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army there furnished but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Army, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which she leuied by her Lieutenant Deretæus (saith Strabo) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horsemen one million; of Chariots armed with hookes on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Galleies with brazen heads three thousand, by which the might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand souldiers: which Galleies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast but fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the same was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerleade the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1 700 000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the seuerall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowen by Staurobates vpon the banks of Indus, canticum cantauit ex- tre-

§. V.

Of the Temple of BELVS built by SEMIRAMIS: and of the Pyramides of Aegypt.

Mong all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes 10
(besides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, inuironed with a wall carried four-square of great height and beauty, hauing on each square certaine brazen gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square she raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all, one aboue an other: vpon the top whereof the Chaldaens Priests made the obseruation of the flares, because this Tower ouer-topped the ordinary cloudes.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower haue many Trauailers beene deceiued; who suppose that they haue scene a part of Nimroes Tower, when it was but the Foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense euery yeare (saith Herodotus). This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, &c. of the temple of Salomon: all which vessels & ornaments Cyrus redeliuered. This Temple Zerxes euened with the foile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the persualions of the Chaldaens. I deny not that it might haue been in his desire so to do, but he enioyed but a few yeares after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Aegyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leauell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the stars that the Chaldaens were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Py- 30 ramides by Memphis, which were conspicua vndiq, nauigantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides Belonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Aegypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report. Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa som-

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM

The birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of ABRAHAM: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successours of SEMIRAMIS: with a briefe transition to the question, about the time of the birth of ABRAHAM.

AFTER the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Amnianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approved writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiected to ease and delicacie, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of ieaiousie he euery yeare changed his Provinciall Governours, and built Colledges for the Chaldaens Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thurast, but that he reduced againe the Bactrians and Cassians, revolted as it seemeth in Ninias as his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius, but that he added sumptuosity, inuented jewels of gold and stone, and some engines for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose waies are warrantable, (till wee meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom, and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninias, Ni- nias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralus, and Xerxes or Balanus. For otherwise if we seeke to proue things certaine by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures set vs down without error, by the raignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at aduenture, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures do not help vs, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non consistere, No miru is if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings raigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's birth, and in what yeare the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeare of Ninus was the birth-yeare of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeare after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeares; others 352. yeares between Abraham and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archiloclus de temporibus (as we finde him in Ammius) makes but 250. yeares from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeare of Ninus, according to Eusebius, and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeare of Abraham's birth was in the yeare after the flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather the yeare 292.

Now, since I do heere enter into that neuer resolu'd question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those dates, which Enue casteth at nouelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the ealie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuercity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue ABRAHAM was borne in the yeare 292. after the flood, and not in the yeare 352.

Those which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeares; betweene the generall flood and Abraham's birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture. So TERAH lived 70. yeares, and begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrewes before them: authorities (while they are lightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the latter Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; that TERAH at 70. yeares begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR and HARAN: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worstifed, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the twentieth yeare of his life. Secondly it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it can not then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeare of Terah

Terah his age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeare, in which his Father died.

Fourthly it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. yeare: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeares.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that ABRAHAM made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

Answer all which objections it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the fall talent which God hath giuen me: Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abraham's iourney into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his trauals, that sereth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not taying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith ABRAHAM (when he was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place, which he should afterward receiue for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither hee went. This supposition (if it be granted) serues very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan.

Against which place so direct, and plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and an other after: no such thing being found in the Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can pick any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that he be beleieued in the rest. But that he performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leauing Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith the Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then multibe inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's comming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those waies, more often than he was enforced so to doe; if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despaire, he had more cause then euer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a Nation of valiant and resolu'd Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arriall, and driuen to flee into Ægypt for relief. His wife was olde, and he had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for Sacrifice : all which discomforts hee patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the waies themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countreys of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauaile through the dangerous and barren Deserts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermom or Gilead : and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if hee trauielled twice; then was his journey in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran : and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe, that he had not animus reuertendi, not any thought looking backward, than any mans bare coniecture, be he of what antiquity or authority sooner. For thus it is written of him: Then Abraham took Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers sonne, and all their substance that they possessed, and they departed from Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if hee could haue bene thereunto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnstedfast, and prest with extreme famine at his first arriuall. For had his Father bene then aliue, hee might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Ægyptians, to whom hee was a meere stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not other-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeares old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite vndone the businesse, which as wee read, was within foure or five yeares after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very solemne oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither he nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within foure or five yeares before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his owne iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only sonne, who was then 35. yeares old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the flood had begotten children, rather than haue left all at randome to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it bee supposed (if it may be belieued) that either Abraham forgot this businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuise. What might be the reason, that Abrahams man in doing his masters errand was faine to lay open the whole story of his masters prosperity, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine author, had so lately bene among them, would not all this haue bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident.

Whether

Whether it were lawful for Abraham to haue returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how auerle hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kindred could not haue bene obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a wife of his owne lineage: not without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey: yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence hee hath taken and transplanted them. That briefe saying, Remember Lot his wife, contains much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Ægypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: wee shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embasie from Babel, it seemes that hee conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a peece of his prosperitie; but the prophesy which thereupon he heard by Isai, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they fate downe and wept. Concerning Ægypt we read, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Ægypt brought calamity vpon Israell: also that their confidence in the Ægyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Ægypt I do not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomie, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Ægypt, for the multiplying of his Horles. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that hee neuer did returne, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abrahams is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of iudgment or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proue it, I will beleaue as they doe. For all the trauals of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem hee removed to a mountaine betwixt Bethel and Hai: thence into Ægypt: from Ægypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattle were more, then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre, neare Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, vnder Abimelec: and after neare vnto it at Berfabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Morish. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one story, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Leuita in his Cabala hath faimed, it should in reason bee therewithall belieued, that hee would in those his first traualles haue provided himselfe of some certaine seat, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goodes and Cattle, not knowing whercon to rest himselfe. But Abraham, when hee came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Morish: where finding no place to inhabit, hee departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth. Hee went forth, going and iourneying towards the South: and alwaies vnstedfast.

By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Aegyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebrai. Further, to proue that hee had not formerly bene in the Countrey, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him saying, Vnto thy Iesse will I giue this Land, throwing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a land to him vnknewne. For Abraham without any other prouident care for himselfe, beleied in the word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being arriued he receiued a second promise from God, that hee would giue those Countreies vnto him and his seede to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted any such double iourney of Abrahams, seeing he setteth downe all his passages else where, long and short: as when he moued from Sichem, and scated betwene Hai and Bethel: the distance being but twenty miles: and when he moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but twenty foure miles: and when hee left Mamre, and fate downe at Gerar, being lesse then fixe miles; no, Moses past ouer all the times of the firstage with the greater breuitie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betwene the Creation and the Flood in six chapters, which age lasted 1656. years: but he beloweth on the story of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fixe and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams traualles, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remoues of fixe miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and comming would haue ministred some varietie of matter, or accident, worthie the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not vnlikelie, that TERAH should beget ABRAHAM in his hundred and thirty yeare.

NOW touching the objection, where it is said, that it was very vnlikelie that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeare, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed misall, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect only to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeares. For when the Angell said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe, SARAH thy wife shall haue a Sonne, it followeth in the next verse, NOW ABRAHAM AND SARAH were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with SARAH after the manner of women: therefore SARAH laughed &c.

So then, in that it is said it ceased to be with SARAH, after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, & not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sons after Sarah's death, as Zimri, son, Isachan, Medan, Midian, Isbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeares after Isaac, and the youngest 40. yeares after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeares old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed depaire of Abraham at one hundred yeares: For Sarah died in the yeare of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeare 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat five sonnes 36. yeares after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. yeares old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Boaz, Obed and Iesse, who liued so many yeares & ages after Abraham, begat sons at 100. yeares, or neare it, it can not be meruailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and feuen yeares after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may haue certainty of ABRAHAMS age from the Scripture, though wee make not ABRAHAM the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of ABRAHAM his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speak something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except wee allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70. yeares old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That wee cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse wee make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeare of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that St. Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeare of Abraham was the 205. yeare of Terah: which knowne, there can be no errour in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nahor and Haran, because they were out of the Church but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenent, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nahor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Be-thuel & Be-thuel of Rebecca the mother of Israel: & Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Be-thuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a sonne at 90. yeares, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nahor; and Jacob Lea and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nahor: it was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these men, times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange Gods, as it is 40 Isa. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and City of Ur in Chaldaea, as Abraham did, and remoued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldaea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan: and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his owne kinsmen: hee himselfe hauing also married in his owne familie; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleued in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had sene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, hee inuited

50 him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in thou blessed of Iehouah &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Be-thuel, and said: This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein hee acknowledged Gods prouidence. Likewise in the following verse it is written: Take, take, goe that thee may bee thy thy masters sonnes wife, even as Iehonah hath said. This their often vsing of the name of Iehonah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now althought he be the opinion of Saint Chrysostome, and some later writers, as Cateian, Olesster, Misgulus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Lahan was an Idoter, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he be lieued in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of Iehonah, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of ABRAHAM first of the three brethren. Gen. II. v. 26. doeth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that ABRAHAM was not the eldest sonne of TERAH.

Gen. II. v. 26.

TO the maine obiection which I answere last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the time, endeuor to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And TERAH lived 70. yeares and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooue at all that hee was the eldest and first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam: nor Isaac of Abraham: nor Jacob of Isaac: nor Iuda and Ioseph of Jacob: nor Dauid the eldest of Iesse: nor Solomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembred.

Aug. quest. super Gen. 25.

But it is written of Noah; Noah was 500. yeares old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Iaphet: shewing that at the 500. yeare of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to St. Augustine speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excelluit ABRAHAM. The order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which ABRAHAM was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it heere, where it is said that TERAH lived 70. yeares and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: For it was late ere Terah began to beget sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nahor at 29. as other his auncestors werat 30. The like also happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130. Enosh 40. Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalael at 70; Mahalael Iered at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeares old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes: as aforesaid. And Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His owne words are these. Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus ABRAHAM: sed merito excellentia, qua in scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be said he, that ABRAHAM was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture hee is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipso patris electio diuina, qua comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat SEMI in libris NOAH, & ABRAHAMO in liberis THARE. Pietie scilicet he or rather diuine election election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and preedencie to SEM among the children of NOAH, and to ABRAHAM among those of THARE.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeare of his age, And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Isaac, when Abraham had liued 86. yeares. Gen. 12. 4. It was at Gerar (the fourth border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. yeares. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and hee had then but the age of 83. yeares: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father 10 Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. yeare old, then must Abraham haue beene 135. yeares when hee first let his foot in Canaan: seeing Terah must bee dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For hee entred at 75: hee rescued Lot at 83: hee had Isaac at 86: hee had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreouer if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70 yeare of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had beene 35. yeares old, and Isaac 49. both which must then haue beene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vntill wee should either deny credit to St. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else giue credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrotator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the grecke word parat, may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeares before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue beene borne in the 70. yeare of Terah; we must giue those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant, For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldaea, nor in Haran: nor in 10. yeares after his arriual into Canaan. For the yeare of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran; was the yeare of the World 2083: and the yeare of Isaacs birth was the Worlds yeare 2094: which maketh 10 yeares difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to bee offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia: nor while Terah liued: nor in lesse then 10. yeares after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeare of Terahs age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 40 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also haue beene the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeares: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeare of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder; if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isah wanted but 10. yeares of Abrahams age: Isaac beinge borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeares old.

It followeth then that if Abraham had beene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at 9. yeares old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeare after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. yeares as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had liued but 9. yeares; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he; bearing the same signification; and names of principallitie. Again, to what end was the word Isah or Isibah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to speak speake of any thing superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes: and if Iscab had not belonged to the story, it had bene but an idle name to no purpose remembre.

Now if it had bene trew (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nabor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Benethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscab in this place, were he not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last.

The age also of Lot disproueth the elderhip of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeares: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah, Abraham marrying one of Haran's daughters, and Nabor the other, Sarah also being within 10. yeares as olde as Abraham: it may appeare to euery reasonable man (not obstinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abraham's elderhip, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeares younger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his wordes are these. Si igitur Haran fuit iunior ipso Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Sarah: imò nec octo &c. and afterward, & idè melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit iunior natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: & quia ponenduserat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ei re promissa expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger then Abraham himselfe, it followeth that he was not 10. yeares old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last born of the three sonnes of Thare, neuertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because he was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following: and because the promise of Christ was first made vnto him, as before it is said of SEM.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition that they which shorten the times make all ancient stories the more vnprouable.

Therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeare of Terah's life, and not in the 70. yeare. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when hee was 75. yeares old, these two numbers added make 205. yeares, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifest the truth of the Worlds storie. I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuersie. For whatsoever is borrowed from him out of his 16. Booke de Ciuitate Dei ca. 15. the same may bee answered out of himselfe in his five and twentieth question vpon Gen. But S. Augustine herein followed Iosephus, and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustin. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrews and Iosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Iewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euerie one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentis & octo decem praefectis habuit:

habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo prebat. And that Pharao invading him with a great armie,ooke from him his wife Sarah. Such fables argue that Iosephus is not to be believed, but with discrete reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeares from the flood to Abraham, is vpheld by manie of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in such matters were worthie to be regarded, it would haue appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whose historie was not so farre remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of manie good writers. Yet grossely haue they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we feldome finde their opinion rehearsed without the confusion treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing vsuall among them, to maintaine whatsoever they haue bene formerly knowne to hold and belieue. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Beraudus, Codoman, Peucer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughten, Dofc, Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to haue been borne in the 130. yeare of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the same Religion, and those neuertheless good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chirac, Functius, and others, are verie averse heerein, especially Iosephus Scaliger with his sebus Calvisius, proclaiming Beraudus an Arch-heretique in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise Augustinus Tornilius a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a iudicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered; not alledging Beraudus, nor any Protestant writer; as being perhaps vnwilling to owe thanks to heretiques. For my selfe I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to vphold it, Nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approued; it but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparant to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times; thereby to approue the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgment to our selues, which of these two accounts giveth the best reputation to the storie of the Scriptures; teaching the worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeares, or thereabouts, betweene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeares betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, and in the 70. yeare of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeares. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiared doe slothfully and drowsily sit downe; wee shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it aboue 1072. yeares betweene the flood and Abraham's birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeares giuen. For if we aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was borne, we shall find that it were verie ill done of vs, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouer-deeply betweene Abraham and the flood: because in cutting them too neere the quicke, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That wherefoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation misunderstood.

For

For in Abraham time all the then-known parts of the world were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the world besides, as far as India: and those not built with tickes, but of hewen stones, and defended with walles and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailles? giuing also strength thereby to common cauellers, and to those mensapish braines, who onely bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and mankind.

¶ VIII.

A computation of the times of the Affryians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of ABRAHAM.

An. mundi 2008
dil. 352. natus Abraham Euseb.
Angl. de Chit.
Dei. 1, 16. c. 17.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alladged, I conclude, that from the generall flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeares were consumed: and taking the Affryian Historie with vs, the same 20 number of yeares were spent from the flood to the 43. yeare of Ninus: in which 43. yeare of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeare of the World 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeares, wee must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that staid in the East, to wit, 30. yeare to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sons, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hanila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Qedan, before Nimrod was borne as it appeareth Gen. 10: in which S. Augusline approueth. Giuing then 30. yeares more to Raama ere hee begat Sheba, and five yeares to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeares were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age ere any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparision: for Peleg, the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeare of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeares more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125: The rest of the time of 131. (in 40 which yeare they arrived in Shinar whereof there are 6. yeares remaining) we may giue them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattle: and as some ancient writers haue conceived, and because of later times, they kept alwaies the mountains sides, for feare of a second flood. Now if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221, of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus, before Abraham borne: both which S. Augusline approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeares of the 352. from the flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114. needeth bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-thort. For Nimrod, by this account, liued in all but one hundred seventy nine yeares: whereof hee reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued four hundred thirty three yeares:

yeares: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne Ninus reigned 9. yeares: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his succellor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babilonia and Affryia 42. yeares, and died in the 52. yeare complet of Abraham's life.

Ninus or Zameis succceeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeares, in the second yeare of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeares old, hereftued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by surprife Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babilonia. Ninus reigned 38. yeares, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeares after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeare of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue bene this Ninus the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeare, as aforefaid, being the 75. yeare of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeare of Abraham, and the 33. yeare of his own reigne: after which hereigned five yeares: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninus, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Affryian kings, that they are to be ordered as wee haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine: vnleffe we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation; which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fablers.

That AMRAPHEL, one of the foure Kings whom ABRAHAM ouerthrew Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene NINUS the sonne of NINUS.

And now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinar or Babilonia, in the 85. yeare of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. yeare of the reigne of Ninus or Zameis the king of the Affryians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how hee could bee at this time king of Babilonia: Ninus or Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninus or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and ouerthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was king of Shinar, which is Babilonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the succellor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeare of Abraham's life: wherein hereftued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer and ouerthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch: for Chedorlaomer commanded in cheife, though Amraphel bee first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or of the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedor. and not of Amraphel: as it is written. Twelve yeares were they subject to CHEDORLAOMER, but in the 13. yeare they rebelled, and in the 14. yeare came CHEDORLAOMER and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedor the principall in this enterprise, who was then king of Elam, and these is Persia: Now Persia being feared ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphel's Countie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babilonia: Amraphel, who held Babilonia in it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the fifth and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodom, Gomor, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel) yet this makes not the conjecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall heare more plainly in that which followeth) received a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the kingdomes betwene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

§. X.

Of ARIOCH another of the foure Kings, and that ELIAS: whereof he is said to haue bene King, lies betwene Celestria and Arabia Petrea.

NOW the two other kings ioined with Amraphel, and Chedorl. were Arioch and Tidal: the one king of Ellasar, the other of the Nations. For Ellasar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Toitatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Peregrinus fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa: which Countries these foure Kings chiefly invaded. Besides that, it is certain, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vsed all the art they had to inuite Crasus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, king of Sodom, Birshak king of Gomorha, Shinarab king of Admath, and Shemebab king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela which is Zoar. All which five kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kind of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning; of which Canaan had 33. all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, be imagined to haue bene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotencie and weaknesse in the kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that diuers kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cesar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatness of these pettie kings, or of the other Countries: But the eies of the world were fixed on Cesar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrey by these foure kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Ruben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the riuier of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consiting of the two small Provinces of Tracemitis or Basari, and the Region of the Moadites: a conquest farre vnuenable, and little answering the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the Pulgar and Aquila conuert Ellasar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a king of the Scythians, a king indeed, as farre fetched to ioine with the Assyrians

in this warre, as the World had any at that time. The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellasar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountaines wherof the Arke did rest, so do they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellasar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Peregrinus himselfe remembereth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus a Græcian Cosmographæ, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Celestria, and St. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Celestria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioined with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrews written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Maschabes: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of St. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, and the principall Commander vnder him, who was a king of kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch heere spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Isaiah, by the name of king of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria: according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betwene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arius, Arioch, Aretas or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Isaiah) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the king of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West to Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their own house, and bloud: which D. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of TIDAL another of the foure Kings.

THE fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, king of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goyim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Culwin of runnagates without habitation: Peregrinus out of Strabo, findes that Galilea was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant, such are the inhabitants of Galilee saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Cananite was then in the Land, how soeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many pettie kingdomes adioyning to Phenicia, and Palæstina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicea, Aparenna, Chalchide, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioine themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

That CHEDORLAOMER the chiefe of the 4. Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

Asly, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperour, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldaes, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian kings wore on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, do not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose cheife Commanders became kings after him. Tamperlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioined a short life: and what fouer things Nature herselfe worketh in hast, the taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before him.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramor: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those kings adioining (whose subiection, and calamities incident was but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the advantage was offered by such a successe. For in reuenge Babylonico hic parum repleuit, this King Ismaelutite (saith Nauclerus of Ninus) in the Babylonian kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing been neuer before gawled with the yoke of forraigne dominion, Nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slavery: no long descent hauing as yet inueited the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him to be pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a mindlesse indolent than his Father, and Mother had vsed before him. And he that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to raigne 42. yeares, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither incauoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keep what he could not without contentions perill enioy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we finde that Amraphel king of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the king of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal, make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impole that great traualle vpon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a pallage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeare of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeares after the death of Semiramis, the neighbor Princes had recovered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis armie of foure millions, with herselfe utterly consumed in India, and all her armes and engins of war, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bene reuolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balanus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est Victor & Triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vndertakings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves, from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, wee may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we graunt this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted them selves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that AMRAPHEL was NINIAS, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

He consent of all writers, whose workes have come to my perusal, agreeing as they doe, that these 4. kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elswhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundrie regions: then may we otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue been vnwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had been a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites; as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue been once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were king of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his care, being diuised by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise-man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Elasar; & that of Tidal, so far off removed were become his dependants, what reason can we finde that might haue induced him, to hearken after Sokome and Gomorah? when he should haue sought the establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the posteritie of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other kings, against five petty townes, leaving Tyrrus, and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and larre neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may bee alleadged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddam, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to bee forgotten, then that hee should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betwene Euphrates, yea betwene themselves and the river of Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no greater wisdom, if he knowing the weaknesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces hee might haue subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrey, was not sufficient to counteruaile one months charges of so huge an armie: How small then must his valour haue bene, who with so mightie preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Palley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although hee had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed so great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the raigne of Ninus who liued foure or five yeares longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if hee had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appeares that these foure kings, were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well bee true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne companie, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it vnprobable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoeuer will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens inuading Africa, and Spaine, with almost as many kings as severall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusuall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the slothfull qualitie of Ninus then reigning in Assyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vndertaking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the raigne of Sennacherib, rather to seeke aduentures abroad, than to remain at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthie than themselves, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streame of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Ninus: and that the power of his Auncelours being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Vnder-king or Satrape of Shinar, vnder Ninus: who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninive: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom hee hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That these foure kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And heere to adde that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, then king of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betwene Syria and Arabia) hauing bene a man of action, or being a worthy mans Sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or petty kings. These and such like things heere to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthie to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people foure these foure were kings, this expedition is the only publique action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his Sonnes, and of his Nephews Elsau and Isachab, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath bene elsewhere already spoken, nor to preuent ourselues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we passe them heere in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appeares that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing kingdome, it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the flood, to the time of the deliuerie of the Isra-lites from thence.

§. I.

A breife of the names and times of the first kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficultie in resolving of the truth in these points.

One after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse known the fertilitie of Ægypt before the flood) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrey:
in which they built many Cities: and began the kingdome one hundred nintieone years after the deluge. The ancient Gouvernours of this kingdome till such time as Israel departed Ægypt are shewen in the Table following.

An. An. di.	An. di.
1847.	191.	Cham.
2008.	352.	Osiris.
2269.	613.	Typhon Hercules.
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesostris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Busrin or Orus the 2.
2476.	820.	Acencher or Therman- tis or Meris.
2488.	832.	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Cheneres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscuritie manifest and resistlesse truth cannot be found.
For S. Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Ægyptian kings, which he would not have done, if they had not bene more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remem-breth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscuritie in the Ægyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Preists: who to magnifie their antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many lea-sings: and recounted vnto strangers, the names of many kings that neuer reigned.
What ground they had for these reports of supposed kings, it shall appeare anon.
Sure it is that the magnificent workes and royall buildings in Ægypt, such as are now found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of meruailous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Preists were not altogether ther false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Ægyptian Historie, was the too much credulitie of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrarie reports of fundrie Ægyptians, and publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs, by their au-thoritie. A third and generall cause of more than Ægyptian darkenesse in all aucient Historics, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (if to the censures of fundrie verie learned I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing scene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Historics, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Heereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Ægyptian Kings, runnes three altogether different waies. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors: The prophane Historics follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appeares that Chams reigne in Ægypt began in the year after the Flood 191.

O reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the auncient kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioined by general consent, with the 43. year of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeares, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater Gods: so that all the yeares of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie, indured fourteene yeares: the foureteenth 26: the fiftenth 37. These three last are said to haue bene vnder the three yonger Gods. So the fiftene first Dynasties, lasted 161.
yeares. As I doe not therefore beleue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bene mentioned, because Anniius in such-wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this only reason, That Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by manie good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the year of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeares, which according to our account were spent in the fiftene former, being subducted out of the summe of 352. yeares, which were betwene the flood and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dyn-astie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Ægypt, was in the year 191.
As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind, which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno à diluuio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fortie yeares as Glycas recordeth: whose report I haue else-where confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his companie, their Wiues, Children, Cattle, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of bogges, Forrests, and briers (which the deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeares had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Ægypt, wee allow twentie yeare: and these summes being added together, to wit one hundred thirtie one yeares after the flood, before they arrived at

Babel,

Babel, 40. yeares for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Aegypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191 yeares: at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Aegypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191 yeares if we adde the 161. yeares of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, wee shall fall right with the yeare of Abrahams birth, which was in common account, An. Dil. 352. And heere to omitting manie other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue bene verie short, and not containing in the whole summe of their severall times about 161. yeares: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Aegypt haue bene peopled as soone as Babel after the flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must haue bene before the flood. That the arrival at Babel was manie yeares before the plantation of Aegypt, after the flood, enough hath bene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the flood, the number of the longliu'd generations betweene Adam and the flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into manie Dynasties, then may this haue bene as well after the flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euerie Countrie erect such forme of Policie, as had bene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conductor, together with manie other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many vnder one king.

THe short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not severall races of kings, as the vaunting Aegyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in institutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to assewer. But this may bee said, partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooffe. That it was the manner of the Aegyptian kings, to put the government of the Countie into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, only reseruing the soveraigntie to themselves, as the old kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed first by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue bene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Aegypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste; though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his private carriage, hee followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not hee the sonne of IERYBAAL? and ZEVL is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, David himselfe hating Isaiah for his crueltye did not punish him, in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Aegypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue laied the burthen of government vpon others; and vpon iaculousse, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other prooffes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph, Only in the Kings throne will I bee above thee: behold I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Aegypt. William, Arch-bishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred eightie, affirms that the like or verie same forme of government by Viceroyes, was in his time practised in Aegypt, hauing there bene in vse (as he beleiued) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Aegypt were not Lords of the Countie, how euer they haue been so deemed; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of ciuile government, but the power of making war and peace, with the whole office and authoritie roiall into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Adulene Elbadch, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authoritie as Ioseph was, though lesse in wisdome.

To thinke that manie names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the list of the Aegyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countie: Besides, it is not vnlikely that the vainglorious Aegyptian Preists would as easily report him a king to posteritie, as ignorant men and strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of importance, and roiall managing of the State had passed, whilst that the king himselfe intending his quiet had giuen his office to another. How strangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example alreadie cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of preists do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authoritie, say, Diodorus, that Sesostrius was the ninetieth king after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 33. after Menas: which could not haue been if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundrie linages or sorts of men, as being made an hereditarie office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the kings guilt, and free choice, that gaue the office. But the Crown roiall alwaies passed by descent, & not by election: which (beside consent of Authors) the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Aegypt for Pharaoh, if the crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children heereby either haue bene intralld amongst the rest of the people, to the next succession: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue bene more mightie then the king: as Lord-lords of all Aegypt, and the king himselfe their Tenant. Likewise wee finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to set on his throne: And in Esay it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient king.

§. IIII.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

That the succession of kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Cheneses, now it followeth to shew. Aegypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not giuen to it because the posteritie of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Aegypt, were called the land of Ham. Further it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying, Mihipater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be vnderstood of Cham: for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Aegyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon not farre from Aegypt doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And St. Hierome in quasiimibus Hebraicis, his faith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his daies call their Countrey Ham: as in foure severall places in the Isalmes this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrey of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (saith he) à Cham N O E S filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidor, Egyptum isq̃ hodie Egyptiorum lingua K A M vocari: that Egypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called K A M. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleaged, which I have already giuen in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham, should last so long as 161. yeares: considering that Sem liued 600. Arpachshad and Shelah each about 400. But strange it had beene, if one Salus created by Manetho, had in those long-liued generations reigned there, 19. yeares, and with Beon, Apaelmas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glorie of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostris. Reinecius in his hystor. Italia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzenius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitye and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it bee, wee know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reinecius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language Mezze. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessarie, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeare of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Amnius his Berosus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebais began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: whose habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie. I can well beleue: assenting so farre to Reinecius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only, according to the severall seats of the kings.

§. V.

of the time when OSIRIS reigne ended: and that IACOB came into Egypt in the time of ORUS the sonne of OSIRIS.

He death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The only coniecture that I know, is made thus. Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybicus, made warre in Italie, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeare of Baleus king of Afryia: before which yeare he had made many great warres in Egypt, Phenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and hauing ended his Egyptian warres, left the kingdom to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the Gods (as they were stiled) held the kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all old Histories agree. Krentzenius hereupon infers, that fixe yeares may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countreies, after the Egyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris haue bene the 34. of Baleus: when himselfe had reigned 297. yeares. I thinke that Krentzenius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those daies when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue been required, to the subduing of so manie Countreies. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had bene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Egypt but seven yeares before the death of Osiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleined. For it was the same king Diuid. Sic. l. 1. c. 1.

Plut. l. de Isis

king who aduanced Ioseph, bad him send for his Father, and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funeral: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the raigne of Osiris, cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh yeare of Ioseph coming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeares from that number, which Krentzenius coniectures his raigne to haue continued: namely seven which he should haue liued after Jacobs coming into Egypt: nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming: and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Ioseph aduancement.

- 10 Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybicus his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italie, is said to haue indured 10. yeares: After which proportion we may well giue not only fixe yeares, as Krentzenius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far-distant Countreies, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeares, which passed betwene the time of Ioseph being sold into Egypt, vnto his aduancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, and whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while cheif Steward vnto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to haue been, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon must needs haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his raigne made his cheif Steward: at which time buying Ioseph and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Ioseph's hands, than vnto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak, or vnclucky in the troublesome daies of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further & say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants: then Putiphar Preist of Om, being cheif Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, & his inuiolent imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife: and being old resigned his office of cheif steward vnto him: who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Preists, when he bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not vnlike to the frierly book of Athenath, Putiphar's daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes usually by means: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Iacob died: it would seeme a matter not vnprobable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should haue spent 42. yeares after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italie, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, & his former enterprises & atchievements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these 40 probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuthelesse I freely grant that all these proses are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscuritie, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

of TYPHON, HERCULES EGYPTIVS, ORUS, and the two SEOSTRES, successively reigning after MIZRAIM: and of diuers errors about the former SEOSTRES.

- 50 Concerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelator giueth three yeares to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so preemprorie without proofe, as if his owne worde were sufficient authoritie, in many points verie questionable; alledging no witness, but as it were saying, Testem ipso: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzenius affirmeth, that Hercules did verie soone vnder-

Exod. 1.

Egyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was verie plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the kings crudelty. Now that Orus the 2. or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted tenne moneths: it is a common opinion of many great & most learned writers; who also think that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Ex. 1. that the King, who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new familie, Reinecius doth shew: who also thinks him Author of the bloody edit. Nevertheless, true it is, that Busiris is according to all mens computation, began his reigne 5. yeares after the birth of Moses, before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began: which Bunting thinks to haue lasted 87. yeares, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let vs the fore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostrius the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroyes in Egypt was: and how great confidence the kings did put in them: seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, & all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his owne father & brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread: Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph: what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue governed himself, would giue such trust, and soueraigne authoritie: it is not vnlkely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often professors, not only the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostrius. But whether Busiris did vsurpe the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title: or whether Busiris were only Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostrius the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeares which passed betwene the beginning of Sesostrius his reigne, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent: the 75. which remaine, are to bee accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeares, according to Eusebius: whom verie many iudicious authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeares: Her name was Thermutis Phareis, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Aencheris: and out of Artabanus his Historie Metris: Iosephus calls her both Aencheris, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made & much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sonnes daughter, but Phareis daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius and others: but whether he were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostrius, Phoron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the neece or grandchild, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glorie of Sesostrius, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was the both daughter, grandchild, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeares. But if she were the daughter of Orus the 2. & sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too yong to rule when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

Hee had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius: but his lineage and offspring described by Reinecius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned 9. yeares: after whom Chencheris, thought to be his son, reigned 10. and then perished in the red Sea. During the reign of Chencheris, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon 10. of which Historie elswhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencheris (whom some call Aencheris: but all or most do stile Sabaoth a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeares: and then Cherres 5. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeare of Cherres it is said by Euseb. that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlkely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posteritie seemes to haue taken all from Cherres: the grand-child of Chencheris. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned 4. yeares after Cherres: and Armais one after Armais: these two kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one; and his reigne said to haue bene 5. yeares. His name is called Armenus, otherwise Danaus; and his pedigree thus described by Reinecius in Historia Julia,

Telegonus:
Epaphus:

Egyptus or Ramesses who gaue name to the Countrey, hauing expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hypermetra.

Danaus or Armenus expelled by his brother Egyptus, after hee had reigned five yeares, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephews sons of Epaphus shoul haue occupied the kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to haue bene borne in the time of Chencheris. But forasmuch as the Historie of Epaphus his birth, is diuerly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the Father of Danaus & Egyptus, otherwise called Armenus and Ramesses, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grandchild of Chencheris. And that the posteritie of Telegonus did marrie very yong, it appears by the historie of these two brethren, Danaus & Egyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sons: perhaps, or rather questionlesse, by diuers women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoeuer it were, the generall content sent of writers is, that Armenus or Danaus did succede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned fixe yeares. Rameffes followed, who reigned 68. yares. T his Rameffes or Aegyptus is that Armeffesimianum or Armeffesimianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moses was born: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go returne to Aegypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee, Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he slew the Aegyptian at the 40. yere of his age: and fled into the wildernes, and there abode for feare: all which Circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common errour, hee placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Aegyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeaes more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Themosis (whom Euseb. calls Amasis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betwene Manetho and Euseb. he findes Moses borne vnder Armeffesimianum: and Israel deliuered in the daies of his sonne Amenophis. The verie name of Alisfragmuthosis seemes to him with little alteration to found like Pharates, of which name of time was thought to haue flourished either as a king, or a wife man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, Pharetasis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my assent heerein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chenures was the king who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place Exod. 4. all are dead &c. may better be vnderstood of Busiris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, St. Cyrill in his first booke against Julian the Apostata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeaes old: Rameffes, which was this Armeffesimianum, being then king of Aegypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeaes: who is thought by Mercator, and preumptoryly by Bunting pronounced, to be the king that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laid open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and heere to speake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Aegypt: which for manie great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly ouer-passe.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuerie of Israel out of Aegypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Aegypt.

Rue it is that the Historie it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this, and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are verie neere as manic, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations vpon St. Augustine citeth manie of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrus out of Sanhoniato, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but if he meant the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrarie to all stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued shee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites or Moabites or Edomites while she ruled, in verum natura.

A second opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolemie a Preist of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus ruled the Argives, and Ames in Aegypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greece Historie the first booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third king ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Affyrinus, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian warre, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by manie arguments.

Fiftly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Graecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Aegypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothos. Eusebius also affirmeth that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses vir Deo conuincit. Eusebius is called Musaeus Iudeorum. Eusebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Aegypt. The ancient Manetho calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Themosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarians will haue to be Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Eysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus giue the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemeth most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Ipheus, gouerned Affyria; or Thopolis Sicyonia; and Crisus the Argines; that then (Sesostris the second ruling in Aegypt) Moses was borne. For if we belcine St. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Aegypt. Eduxi MOSES ex Aegypto populum Deionissimo tempore CECROPI Atheniensium regis: MOSES (saith he) led the people of God out of Aegypt, about the end of CECROPS time king of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Aegypt best proued. St. August. affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Affyria; and that he left Aegypt about the end of Cecrops time.

Now

Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeares; his succesor Mamelus 30. yeares; Sparetus after him 40. yeares: in whose fourth yeare Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Affiria; Orthopolis Sicionia; and Criafus Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augusline, as Cecrops did when he departed Ægypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the ninetenth yeare of the Affirian Saphrus: for take one yeare remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirtie yeares of Mamelus, and the 40. yeares of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeares of Cecrops his 50. yeares: then take nine yeares out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus succellour, those nine yeares added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Ægypt: and adde these nine yeares to the three yeares of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeares of Cecrops his 50.: and so it falleth right with S. Auguslines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Ægypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were opprest in Ægypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeare before the birth of Moses, and 54. yeare, or rather more, after Ioseph: betwene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeares: some of which time, and 80. yeares after, they liued in great seruitude and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens: and they built the Cities Pithom and 20 Ramases &c. And by trauellie they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them wearie of their liues, by sore labour in claie and brick, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a masking power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: euen from 54. yeares, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World, when it had lasted 2370. yeares, to the eightieth yeare of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he persequomed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Cadogan, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Ægypt, may the better be vnderstood, I thinke it necessarie to speake a few wordes of the principall places therein named, in this dis- 30 course.

II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Ægypt, mentioned in this storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

This Cittie which the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built euen yeares after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie; the Septuagint, Tanis; Iosephus Protatides, after the name of an Ægyptian Queen; Antonius giues it the name of Thamis; Hegesippus Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adioineth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein in Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Ægyptian and Iewish idolatrie.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Ægypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlily to be the same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham read Astronomie in Helipolis or On, to Pharates King of Ægypt. Alex. Polyhistor out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise: saying, that Abraham instructed the Ægyptian Priests, and not the king; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Helipolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomie Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Ægypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may it may be that Helipolis to the South of the riuer Tuan, was the same which Vatablus, and our English call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same which Pomp. Mela, and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrinus in the Holte waere, Mulbec; the Arabians Bahabeth and Smعون Sethi, sons Solis. Of this Helipolis or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the territorie adioining Jacob inhabited, while he liued in Ægypt. In the confines of this Citie, Onias the high Priest of the Jewes built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Iherusalem (Ptolomie Philopater then gouerning in Ægypt) which stood to the time of Vespasian, 333. yeares after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsely reporteth, heerein to haue fulfilled a prophesie of Esaie. c. 19. In die illa erit altare Domini in medio terra Ægypti. In that day shall the altar of the Lord be in the midst of the land of Ægypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannising ouer the Jewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Ægypt. Lastly, there it was, that our Sauour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Marie feared the violence of Herod: neare which (saith Brochard) the fountaine is still found, called Iesus Well, whose streames doe after ward water the gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Ægypt. And heereof see more in Brochard in his description of Ægypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esaie and Ezechiel; the same which Hofea the prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a mountaine adioining, so called, which mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great Citie, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint writeth. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Macar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalen, for Mizraim.

Pelufium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrinus) que olim dicta est Pelufium, Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelufium.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Ægypt. Hierome conuersts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bubastus, for so Hierome and Ziegler write it, is the same which the Hebrewes call Pibesth.

To make the storie the more perceivable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israellites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Helipolis or Bethsemes, Balsophon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desertes of Arabia the Sonie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what we read, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions do. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in manie places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authoritie, after many others more ancient, that great learned man Arius Montanus; who in his Preface to the storie of the Holie land, hath these words. Si enim obijci lacorum obseruatione res gesta narrentur, aut sine Topographia cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, vt ex ijs nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit. If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

p. III.

Of the crueltie against the Israelites yong children in Aegypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

BVt to returne to the storie it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slauerie, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora & Thina, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que praeerat (saith Comestor) multitudinis obstericum, who had commandment given them over all midwives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the midwives of Aegypt together, had beene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Aegyptians, it is diuersly disputed. St. Augustine calls them midwives of the Hebrew women &c. But Iosephus, Abulenſis, and Peterius beleue them to be Aegyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witnesse both the wickednesse of the Aegyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding those women filled with pietie, and the feare of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoeuer, to destroe all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery king oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might haue employed or sent awaie at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth an other cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Aegyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should bee borne a child; who growing to mans estate should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a mean, contrarie to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Heredotus long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as it should haue bene temporal, he caused all the male children at that time borne to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the first of Exodus. Come, let vs worke wisely with them, least they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there bee warre, they inioine themselves also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But wee fee, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relye on the inuentions of their owne most feeble; and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearly beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods meruallous workes taken out of Nilus, being thercinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princeesse hauing beheld the child his forme and beaurtie, though but yet in the blouth, so perced her compassion, as she did not only preferue it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should bee esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memorie that it was her deede, shee called the child Moses, as it were, extraitus, or creptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expressing water, and hise, as much to say, as that that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before he was put into the Arke of Reedes, and that Amram, his father, had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care and at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding taught and instructed: quem regio more educat, profectus est sapientibus Aegyptiorum Magistris, à quibus eruditetur, saith Basil; Vnto whom shee gaue Princelie education, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Aegyptians, for his instruction. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Aegyptians, which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth. And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Aegyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as St. Seneca hath gathered, we haue added; betweene the death of Moses, and the raigne of Iosaphat.

p. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Aegypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastoral life: and what of PEREGRINUS of the bookes of GENESIS and IOB.

WHen Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus, and Eusebius, but of Artapanus, tell vs of ten years warre that he made against the *Ethiopian*s: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Gambyses called Aetac; and how he recovered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Ethiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Comestor a prettie tale of Moses; How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resuming his returne into Aegypt, Moses, most skilfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to be engrauen in two precious stones: whereof the one encreased memorie; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reseruing the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after shee had awhile worn, shee beganne to neglect the loue shee bare her husband; and so Moses without danger returned into Aegypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 43. yere of Moses age, when he beheld an Aegyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moued by compassion in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Aegyptian. Soone after which act, finding a disposition in some of his owne Nation to accuse him, for whose defence hee had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduise of God, whose cholen seruant hee was, hee fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Countie to Aegypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnknewen vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews; it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldlie means) to make the watering of a few sheepe, and the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countie nearest Aegypt, fitted to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because interjacent betwene Aegypt and Iudea, through which he was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glorie of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, covered him ouer; and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sojorne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter; but as a meeke and humble sheepe-herd, sitting at a mountaine foote; a keeper and commander of those poore beasts only.

In that part of Arabia, neare Madian, he consumed 40. yeres: And though (as Philo Philo in the storie of Moses life obſerveth) he did not neglect the care of thoſe ſlocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Paſtorall knowledge; yet in that ſolitarie Deſert he enioyed himſelfe: and being ſeparate from the preſſe of the world, and the troubleſome affaires thereof, he gaue himſelfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himſelfe all thoſe knowledges, whereof his younger yeares had gathered the grounds and principles: the ſame Author alſo judging, that his Paſtorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principallity, which he afterward obtained. Eſt enim (ſaith Philo) quasi praedidum ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansueti ſunt. Quemadmodum bellicus ingenis praecercent ſeu venationibus, experientia in ſeris, quod poſtea in militia & bella perfectura ſunt; brutis praetentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam ſimile cum regno in ſubditis ideus. Reges regnantur Paſtores populum, non contumelias ſed honoris gratia: The art of keeping ſheepe is, as it were, an introduction to a Kingdome, namely, the rule over men, the moſt gentle ſtroke: Even as warlike natures doe before-hand exerciſe themſelves in hunting, praſticing on wild beaſts theſe things, which after they will accompliſh in warfare: theſe brute beaſts affording matter, wherein to traine themſelves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the government of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of reſemblance unto a Kingly rule over ſubjects, therefore, Kings are ſtilled ſheepe-headers of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Job, as Pererius ſuppoſeth, I cannot iudge of it, becauſe it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I ſubſcribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the bookes of Geneſis; although I cannot denie the reaſon of Pererius conjecture. That by the example of Job's patience hee might ſtrengthen the oppreſſed Hebrewes: and by the promiſes of God to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, put them in aſſurance of their delivrie from the Egyptian ſlaverie, and of the Land of reſt, and plentie promiſed.

Of his calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the meruailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perſwade Pharaoh, that hee was the meſſenger of the moſt High, the particulars are written in the firſt fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needleſſe. But for the firſt, it is to be noted, that when Moses deſired to be taught by God; by what name he ſhould make him knowe, and by whom he was ſent; he rejoyced from God ſo much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivred him in the firſt part of his anſwere, a name to be conſidered of by the wiſe: and in his ſecond, to bee vnderſtood by all. For there is nothing that is; or hath being of it ſelfe, but the eternall; which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment; their ſubſtance waſteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing 40 at oneſt; nor being the ſame ſo long, as while one may ſay Now. Likewiſe, whatſoever is conſumed in the longeſt continuance of time, the ſame in euery ſhorreſt ſpace of time ſurely decay; neither doth any thing abide in one ſtate. *Præſens Dei ſubſtantia, quæ uerè eſt: id enim quod ſubſiſtens non habet aliunde ſum eſſ. Cetera quæ uerè ſunt, etiam ſi uidentur eſſe non ſunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt; & poteſt non ſuſſiſtere. quod non ſciunt 3. It is that one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he created, although he ſeemeth to be, yet they are not; for ſometimes they were not; and that which hath not bene, may againe not be. And with this, in reſpect of the diuine nature, the ſaying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota ueritas natura eſt, et inuisibilis, et ſolida; The whole nature of things is but a ſhadow, either empty or deſceptiſh; in comparison of whom (ſaith Eſay) *all Nations are as nothing, leſſe then nothing, and vanitie.

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Egyptians were ſtricken; the firſt was by changing changing the Riuers into blood: God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Reuelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the waters ſay, Lord, thou art iuſt, which art, and which waſt: C. 16. v. 6. and holy, becauſe thou haſt iudged theſe things; for they ſhed the blood of the Saints and Prophets, and therefore haſt thou giuen them blood to drinke.

The reſt of the plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or ſtinging Waſpes; by the death of their Cattail; by leaproſc ſcabbes; by haile and fire; by Graſhoppers; by darkneſſe; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his preſence: moued the hardened heart of the vnbeleeking King no longer, then the paine and perill laſted, till ſuch time as his owne firſt-borne, and the firſt-borne of all his Nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) ſtood vpon no condition: whereas before, hee firſt yeelded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reſeruing their beſtiall; but hee was now content for the preſent, that the Iſraelites ſhould not only depart with all their owne, but with a part of the ſilver, gold, and jewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being paſt) he ſuddainly repented him, as his purſuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses receiued) ſlaine a Lambe, without ſpot or blemiſh, for the Paſſeouer, (a Sacrament of the moſt cleane and vnſpotted Sauour) and with the blood thereof coloured the poſte and linterne of the dores; the Angell of God in the dead of the night ſmote euery firſt-borne of Egypt, from the ſonne of the King, to that of the beaſt and ſlaue: the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yeelded, as before is ſaid, to their departure. The Egyptians (ſaith Epiphanius) did in after times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Iſraelites uſed after the Paſſeouer; aſcribing an exceeding vertue to the red colour: and therefore they did not only marke their ſheepe and cattell, but their trees bearing fruit, to preſerue them from lightning and other harmes.

¶ V.

Of Pharaohs purſuit of the Iſraelites: and of their paſſage towards the red Sea, ſo farre as Sueoth.

NOW, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) hee beſought him aſwell of the honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many calamities and plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoiles of his people, and in deſpiſt of himſelfe. And hauing before this time great companies of 40 ſouldiers in readineſſe, hee conſulted with himſelfe, what way the Iſraelites were like to take. He knew that the ſhorreſt and faireſt paſſage was through the Countrie of the Philiftims. But becauſe theſe people were very ſtrong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, hee ſuſpected that Moses meant to finde ſome other outlet, to wit, through the Deſert of Etham; and there, becauſe the Countrie was exceeding mountainous, and of hard acceſſe, and that Moses was peſtered with multitudes of women, children, and cattail, he thought it impoſſible for the Iſraelites to eſcape him that way. In the meane while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them; he determined to ſet vpon them in the plaines of Gofen, which way ſoever they turned 50 themſelves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in thoſe Chariots, armed with brode and ſharpe hookes on both ſides, in fiſhion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines uſed againſt the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conqueſt of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Iſeophus affirmeth, that it conſiſted of 50000. horſe, change alwaies at one houre; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to bee obserued by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not full alike) into any certaine rule: Here lay much wisdom and deepe art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an climate at random, the Athenians held the yeare to containe 360. daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Gracian yeare (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest by that which Plinie directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalerus, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeare exceeded not that number of daies. By this account neither did any certaintie of the Moone beginne or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeares, in their owne places: but must needs be liued by little and little, from Winter to Sommer, and from Sommer to Winter, as the daies forgotten, to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne rooms in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnitie of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Elecambæon (which and wreth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order; that this moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding some two daies to the last moneth of euery yeare; those games being held once in foure yeares. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeare, which was the second of the moneth Bacchomian 3 (agreeing nearely with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it into the fourth Lunarie yeare, accounting by the Moone; after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their moneth of June would euery yeare haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keepe all vp right, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeare one whole moneth, which they called the second Pofideon, or December; which was the deuice of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. and so successiue through the whole yeare. Thus with much labour they kept their yeare as neare as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these marks which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeares intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 24. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good methode, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeares intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeares, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeare, as in the 19. yeare before past (hee had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing 40 from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in golden letters, being called the golden number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoided the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had bene vsed; for by the intercalation of 7. moneths in the 19. yeares, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeare could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeares; and afterwards Hiparchus, a noble Astraloger, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently 50 corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Caesar made, who by aduise of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heauenlie bodies, reduced the yeare vnto the forme which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. daies and fixe houres, which houres in foure yeares make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeare, the 24. of Februarie. The correction of the Julian yeare by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeede, but as a note added vnto the worke of Caesar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Aequinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeare 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in steade of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moueable Feasts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Councell they had bene. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundreth yeare, the leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sunne doth not in his yeardie course take vp full fixe houres about the 365. daies; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeares make about 3. whole daies.

But the Cycle of 19. yeares, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did neede any nice curiositie of houres, minutes, and other lesser fractions to helpe it; neither did in summing vp the daies of the whole yeare, neglect the daies of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwaies the Kalends or first day of the moneth was at the new Moone, and because that day was festiual, they were very careful awfull to obserue the short yeare of the Moone, passing through all the 12. signes in one moneth, as that longer of the Sunne, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave to Nisan their first moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. daies; to Iar their second moneth 29. daies; and so successiue 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that euery two moneths of theirs contained somewhat euenly two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. daies, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact daies, which made vp 7. moneths in 19. yeares, to 6. of which 7. 30 were commonly giuen 30. daies; to one of them 29. daies, or other wise as was found requisite. Their common yeare (as appeareth by the severall daies of each moneth) contained 354. daies, which faile of the yeare, wherein the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole daies, with some fractions of time. But these daies, and other broken peeces, howsoeuer they were neglected in one yeare, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeares were so disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the yeare, moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. yeares before.

Diuers haue diuerly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeare, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigonius tells vs, that euery second yeare they did adde a moneth of 22. daies; euery fourth yeare a moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. 13. c. 1. daies and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeare of the Sunne. But herein Sigonius was very much deceiued. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. daies: and therefore to haue added so many daies to the end of the yeare, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the moneths in the yeares following, which could not haue begunne as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeare, or second yeare, as neede required, they did intercalate one moneth, adding it at the yeares end vnto the other 12. This I beleue to haue been true; but in which of the yeares the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) he thinks they do not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeares. For (to omit such as erre grossly) some there are who say, that after three yeares, when besides the daies spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. daies are left remaining, that is, 11. daies of each yeare; then did the Hebrewes adde a moneth of 30. daies; keeping three daies, as it were in plussage vnto vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixt year; at which time, besides the intercalare moneth, remained fixe daies, namely three surmounting that moneth, and the Epact of three yeares, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. year; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. year make vp a moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Sig. de rep. lib. 1. c. 1.

Whether this were the practise, I can neither affirme nor denie; yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeare euery moneth were removed from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeare and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnuoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of intercalation in the 8. yeare. For the 6. daies remaining after the 2. former intercalations made in the 3<sup>d</sup> and 6th yeares, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7th and 8th yeares, doe fully serue to make vp a moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeare following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeede it helps to make the yeares ensuing varie the lesse from the proper season of euery moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and Yeares, by which they guided their accompts.

¶ VII.

Of the passage of ISRAEL from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers waies leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recouer the mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horlemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight mile. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two millions of Soules, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundrie sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desert and high mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue ouer-taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them.

It is probable that all those Egyptians & others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East side of the land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the horse and chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the all-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glorie of his deliuerance and victorie to almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day

For these his owne words. They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East side of the land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the horse and chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the all-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glorie of his deliuerance and victorie to almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. mile distant; and fare downe betweene two ledges of mountaine adioyning to the Red Sea; to wit, the mountaines of Etham on the North, and Balzephon towards the South: the same which Oserius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as Dominus specula, sine custodia, Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians beleued, or at least made their slaues beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had Gods for all turnes.

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage vp and downe; than that it is any proper name.

10 Egypt Dijs facundi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in Gods, saith S. Hierome. But Moses who incamped at the foot of this mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower alleepe, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Calotis, the fairest and thorstest of all other, in respect of Iudaea, as the other by Etham; from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and tooke the way by the valley of Pihacheroth, between the mountaines, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speede with his horlemen and chariots, as hee gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rett them after so long a march; but gat sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brincke and wath of the Sea: inlomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach beganne to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And scarce, which, saith the booke of Wisdomes, is the betraying of those succours which be as an offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

¶ VIII.

BVt Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath neuer abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; vnto this comfortable and reuelous speech. Feare not, for the Egyptians whom ye haue seene this day, yee shall neuer see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses calling on God for succour, receiued encouragement, and commandment to goe on, in these wordes. Wherefore criest thou vnto me: speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it, and let the children of Israel goe on drie ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands vnconquered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere hee entered the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Exod. 14. v. 13.

Exod. 14. v. 16.

Pharaoh followed him euen at the heeles, finding the same drie ground which Moses trod on. Therefore as it is written, The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behinde them: also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministerie of his Angell, to interpose his defence between the Hebrewes and their enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby bee blinded, in such fort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmefull speede. But in the morning watch Moses seised the other banke of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day beganne so illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas

Iosua 24. v. 7.

Exod. 14. v. 27. Seas returne, halted himselfe towards his owne coast: but MOSES stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is; the Sea moued by the power of God, ranne backe towards the land with vnrresistible furie and swiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheeles, that is; when the waters began to couer the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with feare of death, ranne one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheeles stucke fast in the mudde and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Tyrannus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceiued, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduenture, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honoured above the rest, according to the prophesie of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hossee condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desert, and, as wenow call it, led the Vanguard; (where-vpon it may bee inferred, that hee also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally receiued. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalm; Thou didst lead thy people like sheepe by the hand of 20 MOSES AND ARON.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into 12. parts, and that euery Tribe past ouer in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm, according to the Vulgar, Diuisit mare rubrum in diuisiones; Hee diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene field or pasture. But Orogen, Epiphanius, Abulenſis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not 12. pillars, nor 12. armies of the Egyptians. It is written in the 77. Psalm. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thymates; and in the last of the booke of Wise dome, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chencres, perished in the 16. yeare of his raigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea; though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selues know by experience; it is of a blewish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait betwene Arabia the Happie and Ethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomie calleth Possadium, to the other land of Ethiopia, hath not about fixe leagues in breadth: and the same also filled euery where with islands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. leagues from coast to coast: and it runneth vp betwene Arabia the Happie, and Arabia Petrea, on one side, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as farre as Sues, the vttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his flecte of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites of the Citie Hero, sometime Troy: and of later times Sues. Plinie calls it Cambisus, by which name it was knowne, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeares. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Eleniticum: King Iuba Leniticum: others more properly Eleniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elat: Ptolomie Elana: Plinie Lena: Isopbus Ilana, and Marius Niger Atla: there is also Ilalah in Assyria, to which Salomanaſſer carried the Israelites captiue Kings 2. c. 8. 11. which Ilalah in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chron. the 5. Ala. But as for this red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraea: of a King called Erythras, or Erythraeu: and because Erythros

A Description of the Land of Gosen, and Moses passage thro- ugh the Deserts.

thros in the Greece signifieth red, hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraeus, the sonne of Persus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the red Sea, as Quin. Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discourse of that Sea in the yeare 1544. performed by Steuens Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the bancks, cliffs, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall commander vnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Mr. Richard Hakluyt to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalagua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25.
 10 leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall latitude, to 27. (which make in length of coast 180. mile, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sunne beames, giue a kinde of reddish lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and wee know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corall growes, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red
 20 trees, saith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadowes of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Eumiticus, which watheth the banks of Madian or Madan, is for 16. or 17. leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three leagues or nine English mile ouer, and from this Port of Toro, to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. leagues, of which the first 26. haue 30 nine miles breadth: as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Aegypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and straighten it so fast, as for sixe miles together it is not about three mile ouer; from thence vpward the land on Aegypt side, fallett away and makes a kinde of Bay or Coue for some ten miles together, after which the land grows vpon the Sea againe, and so binds it into the very end thereof; at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer against Elana or Toro; but without iudgement: for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Balsophon, there is not about 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three daies: and betweene the land of Aegypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is about 80.
 40 miles. For Ramases to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaos at Zaan, and tooke his last leaue, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude: and Migdall, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foote of the mountaine Climax, or Balsophon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of sixe and thirtie English mile: the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the red Sea was miraculow, and not at a low Ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue objected that Moses past ouer the red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tide, and that Pharao conducted more by furie then discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was ouertaken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authoritie to men that beleue not therein perfwadeth nothing) I say that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from aboue or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses, and the children of Israel than ordinarie and casual, then could not Pharao and all his armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For wherefoerer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the land: and runne downward towards the Ocean:
leaving all that part towards the land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to bee drie land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Migdall vnder Balcephon (if hee had taken the aduantage and opportunitie of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue mile farther into the Sea then Sues, much more was it made at Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past: who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleene or Strait, had bene by the ebbe of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharao found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tide, on his right hand: and so taken ground againe at the end of that sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrarie, that is,
That the sea did not fall away from the land, as naturallie it doth; but that Moses past on betwene two seas: and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue bene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Againe, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong east-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that sea doth not lie East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-winde blew athwart the sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South, and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnknewne to Pharao: while he was cheekt by that sea which vsed in all times before to ebbe away: the flood prest him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent iudgement generally, but also so great a Captaine, as he ouerthrew the Ethiopians in many battels, being imploied by Pharao, and wandiers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grosseness, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a mountainous passage at hand, (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water.

For

For hee knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding *Pharao*s approach, cried out against Moses, and despaird altogether of their safetie: and when Moses praised vnto God for helpe, he was answered by God:
*Wherefore criest thou vnto me: speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharao's approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperic and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the sands discovered themselves betweene the sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vp right as walls doe, as some of the Schoolemen haue fancied. For had Pharao and the Egyptians perceiued any such buildings in the sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharao and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the sea, in his owne Countrie, on his owne coast, and in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens, and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeares experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand only; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Arme of the Egyptians had bene ouertaken by the ordinarie returne of the flood, before they could recover their owne coast; their bodies drowned would haue bene carried with the flood which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that sea, and not haue bene cast alhore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the sea-banke ouer against Balcephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the red Sea, to which place the ordinarie flood would haue carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and runne athwart it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the Egyptians bodies there; but it keepe the naturall course, towards the end of that sea: and to which their carcases should haue bene carried, if the worke had not bene supernaturall and miraculow. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staid in the Countrie, and did not follow Pharao in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of *Pharao*s destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden made a God of that Plant or Roote, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be gi-uen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans tells vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeares after Christ, the prints of *Pharao*s Chariot wheelles were to be seene at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe.*

CHAP. IIII.

Of the iourning of the Iſraelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of ſome things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the ſtorie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Iſraelites.

But to goe on with the ſtorie of Iſrael, in this ſort I collect the times. Moſes was borne in the yeare of the world 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Aſſyria; Orthopolis Syria; or Peloponneſus; Criſus the Argiues; Orus Egypt; and Deucalon Theſſalie. He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres, in the yeere of the world 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the yeere 2514. in the laſt moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the firſt

Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sunne ſetting, in the yeere of the world 2514. was the celebration of the Paſſouer: and in the dead of the night of the ſame day were all the firſt-borne ſlaine through 30 Egypt, or in all thoſe parts where the Hebrewes inhabited. The 15. day of the firſt moneth, of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the world 2514. Moſes with the children of Iſrael removed from the generall aſſembly at Ramſeſes, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Eſtham: and iourning from Eſtham they incamped in the valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, vnder the mountaine Baalzephon; and in the ſame night after mid-night, they paſt the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Armie periſhing in their returne, about the firſt dawne of the day. Moſes hauing recovered the banks of Arabia, gaue thanks vnto God, for the deliuerie of Iſrael; and making no ſtay on that coaſt, entred the Deſerts of Arabia Petrea, called 40 Sur. But finding no water in that paſſage, he incamped at Marah, in the Deſert of Eſtham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is alſo called Sur, 25 miles from the Sea: where the children of Iſrael preſt with extreme thirſt, murmured againſt Moſes the ſecond time; firſt at Pharaohs approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moſes taking the branches of a tree, growing nere a lake of bitter water, and caſting the ſame thereinto, made the ſame ſweet: a plaine Type and figure of our Sauour; who vpon the tree of the Croſſe changed the bitterneſſe of euerlaſting death into the ſweetneſſe of eternall life. Plinie remembers theſe bitter fountains in his ſixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Seſoitris firſt, Darius after him, and laſtly Ptolomie the ſecond, beganne to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and ſmall ſhipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the ſixth Manſion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelue fountains of ſweet water, and 70. Palme trees, hee reſted diuers daies.

Whether

Whether this Helim was the name of a Towne or Citie in Moſes time, I cannot affirme. And yet the ſcarcitie of waters in that Region was ſuch, as Helim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly bee leſt vnſcopied. William, Arch-Biſhop of Tyre, in his Hiſtorie of the Helie Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And at ſuch time as Baldvine the firſt paſt that way into Egypt, Ingreſſus (ſaith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquiſſimam populo Iſraelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum perueniſſet, loci illius incolæ, Regis aduentu præcognito, nauiculam ingredientiſ in mare vicinum ſc conſulerant; Entering Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne ſometime to the people of Iſrael; whither, when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, tooke Boate, and ſhifted themſelves into the Sea, lying near 10 them. From Elim hee returned againe towards the South, and ſate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the ſeuenth Manſion. For it ſeemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to reſiſt his paſſage through that part of Arabia. And Moſes who had not as yet trained thoſe of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor aſſured the minds of the reſt, who encountering with the leaſt miſericie, were more apt to returne to their quiet ſlauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that paſſage, or at this time to undertake or ſuſtaine ſo dangerous an enemy: hee therefore made ſtay at this Manſion, vntill the fifteenth of the ſecond Moneth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eight 20 Manſion in the Deſert of Zin; where the children of Iſrael mutinied againſt Moſes the third time, hauing want of foode. In the ſixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moſes omitteth this retreat from Elim to the red Sea, but in the collection of euery ſeuerrall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is ſet downe.

Here it pleaſed God to ſend ſo many flights of Quails, as all the Countie about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it alſo rained Manna, being the ſixteenth of their Moneth, which ſerued them in ſtead of bread. For now was the ſtore conſumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattle, and Sheepe among them, yet it ſeemeth that they durſt not feede themſelves with many of thoſe: but referred them both for the milke to releue the children withall: and for breede to ſtore 30 themſelves when they came to the land promiſed.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie mile: the one to Daphnet, the other to Alu, diſtant from Raphidim ſixe miles. Here being againe preſt with want of water they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themſelves to bee fed and beaten after the manner of beaſts, than to ſuffer a caſuall and ſometime neceſſarie want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and traualles which euery manly minde ſecketh after, for the loue of God and their owne freedoms. But

Moſes with the ſame rod which hee diuided the Sea withall, in the ſight of the Elders of Iſrael, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were ſatiſfied:

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and IETHROES coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Midian.

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrey (which being barren of it selfe, would bee vterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattle) thought it most for their aduantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man infelbed them. On the other side Moses perceiving their resolutions, gaue charge to Joshua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victorie remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses praier to God bene of farre greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcitie of fooode, and those minds whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten and despaird in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazard themselves.

After this victorie Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till he had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exodus, v. 1. When IETHRO the Priest of Midian, MOSES Father in Law, heard all that God had done for MOSES, &c. of which, the last deede, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel; being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of 30 people, full of discontentment and private controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges v. 11. & 17. it is made manifest; where it is written. Now HEBER the Kenite, which was of the children of HOBAB, to wit, the sonne of IETHRO, the father in law of MOSES, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, least he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balac, speaking of the Kenites. Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocks. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giueth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Midian, one of the sixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made Iethros Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot bee meant by these; who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genes. ver. nineteenth these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the the Hittites and Perizites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeede afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, HEBER the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh or Kadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, for any of Abrahams other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the Riuer Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neare the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the ouerthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to haue bene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea; were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrarie is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as farre backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroyed that Madian, where his wiues kindred inhabited: seeing himselfe comming with 600000. able men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeare.

That Iethro, or Isihor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our English Reuel; Exod. 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Isihor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. & 4. v. 18. & 30 c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Numbers c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen: with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

The rest of the moneths of this yeare 2515. were spent in the Desert of Sinai, neare the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 16 it is written Sinai. In the 100. Psalm v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Dent. 4. 10. & 15. & Dent. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the 2. of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. Which hearsest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the yeare 1588 so past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and traiailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellen

excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neare Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he camped thereabout almost a yeare, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron let vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angell of God was given to Moses, where he staid a whole yeare, wanting some ten or twelue daies: for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeare; and he arriued about the 45 day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 30. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Louitions; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit thererepetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the storie any way disioyned, he may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouerne that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very linewes of euery estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eie without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what he hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue.

This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those, which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as Gods, or as the sonnes of Gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no less liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedaemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedaemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and so in an indifferent sense vsed. For if we consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance

nance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be oblerued by force, for their decrees doe also vsurpe that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Ely, Vocato them 18. 10. that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vsufficient. Mala res est, quae tumultuaria posita est: It is an 1 Ethic. 4. c. 1. ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, good or euill, are called by the name of lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it 10) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to its selfe, as to their patterne and platforme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem fomitis, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as * elsewhere, * Gr. 5. 4. 1. 1 Tim. 2. 2. this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in St. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law. But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my minde, and leading me captive vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called * lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Also priuate contracts among Merchants and other Tradesmen, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges inique, are by Thomas called uoluntarie magis quam leges; rather compulsions then lawes. And whatsoeuer is not iust, Saint Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howsoeuer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quae nec iura dicenda, nec putanda sunt: The vniust constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought Lawes. For saith ARISTOTLE, Legalis iusta sunt facit iura, & conseruatiua felicitatis: Iust Lawes are the workers and preferers of 10 happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero. Yea, to life euerlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship. Finis legis Dei est cultus eius: Lex, or the Law plato in Dial. 7. is so called by the Latines a legende, or a ligande, of reading or binding: Leges quae leguntur, & ad populum latae, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Ety-mologie, a ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confringerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they 12 Gen. 5. haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalme, dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proiciamus a nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands 16 Psal. 40 in sunder, and cast away their cordes from vs.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word authen, a Testament or last will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectfull for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator, for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is theroby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est: The raigne of the law, is the raigne of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vit a regula, praecipiens quae sunt sequenda, & quae fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow and what to shunne, or Lex est omnium diuinorum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princess of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of inuitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the Iudge and measure of right and wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Civile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two general words Ius and Eas: whereof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Eas to God. Eas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer an other mans field, is permitted by Gods law, not by mans: and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsed both those words: as Eas & iura sinunt: God and Men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the old substantiue Nowne iussus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke ζωε, which is the name of Iupiter: or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis: because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certain that Ius-inandum came of Iouis-inandum (for so we finde it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum Iehoua) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicererents the Magistrates, he is the pronouncer and exequutor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, Iustus a iure, and iustitia a iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

¶ V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the Law eternall.

But because lawes are manifold, and that every kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The

The law eternall is thus defined by THOMAS. Lex aeterna est aeternus diuina sapientia conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso praecognitum; The eternall law is the eternall concept of Gods wisdom, as it is referred to the gouernement of things foreknowne by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atq; aeterna ratio diuina sapientia: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illius iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessity according to their severall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called prouidence: but as it imposeth a necessitie according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, hee wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a delicto auocans: qua non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum ratio est recta summi Iouis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then beginne to be a law when it was written: but when it had. Being being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Princess to command and forbid is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man finds it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens, stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men: another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely, as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawne: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiect: as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessarie or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall, and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as Praise him all ye his Angels: praise ye him Sunne and Moone; all ye bright Starres: heauens of heauens; for he hath established them for ever and euer: Aee hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all depths: Fire, and haile, snow, and vapours, stormie winds, which execute his Word: mountaines, and hills: fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glorie and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it: without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: rhings without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauie to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoeuer is appoled. This kinde kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature : others to fate ; a difference vied in termes only ; it being no other then Gods generall providence : for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia : so are all things which appeare in themselves, thence derived : there-vnder subiected : thence-from by his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes : and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and obiect of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them : so is the obiect and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to St. AVGVSTINE. Lex eterna est, quoniam est vbi omnia sunt ordinatissima ; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no ? But the resolution is, that it changeth not ; for which St. Augustine voucheth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-will the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Pedagogia of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired : which time of expiration some thinke our Sauour noted to be come, when on the Crosse hee said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauour to haue no other signification, then that now the prophetic of their giuing him Vineger to drinke was fulfilled. For so St. Iohn expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said I thirst : though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Iewes, and agreeeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospell of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe : but the things prescribed change according to this eternall ordinance ; of which the Wisedome of SALOMON. And being one see can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

IF the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen : only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis eterne in rationali creatura. *VLP*IAN defines the naturall law to be the same which nature hath taught all liuing creatures ; Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit : and he afterward addeth, Lex istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quae terra maris, nascuntur, animam quoque commune est ; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures : as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall law in things of life.

The law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall qualitie, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuine lumen in men, enlightning our formall reason : so is it more then sense in beasts : and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their liues : seeing that Bulls and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogs : and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from from the other, yea though by them neuer seene before ; and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons : or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twigs which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere : to saue their egges and yong ones from the Monkees, and other beasts, whose weight such a twig will not beare : and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not beare any fruit except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that law which the infinite and vnsearchable wisedome of God, had in all eternitie provided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this law is double : corrupt, and incorrupt ; corrupt where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassal to passions, and affections brutall : and incorrupt where time and custom hath bred in men a new nature, which also as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the law of Nature incorrupt, which St. Augustine calleth the law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft : and that other Nations were by law constrained to become Idolaters ; that by the lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vie one an others wife, and to the women to choose them others besides their husbands, to beget them with child : which law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to burie with them the best beloued wiues : as also they haue many other customes remembered by G. Velema, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authoritie it is that these lawes some men auow to be naturall : except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile : to become faithlesse among the faithlesse : to provide for our selues by another mans destruction : that iniurie is not done to him that is willing : to destroy those whom we feare : and the like. For taking the definition of naturall lawes ; either out of St. Augustine or Aquinas (the one calling it the impression of diuine light, the other, the dictate or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, then to the exercise of Iustice and vprightnesse : and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would bee content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the law of nature to the minde, as the eie is to the bodie ; and that which according to Dauid heareth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end ; which is eternall life : though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the law increased and eternall. For without any law written the right reason and vnderstanding which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrarie, wee prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith S. PAVL) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the law : they haueing not the law, are a law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom wee are, and to doe the same right to all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason : in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation. In more alisamaritanis quies habitat ; Therefore, the Gentiles (saith S. PAVL) which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for witnesses of those effects : and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law vnto himselfe (while he hopeth to abuse the law by the aduantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying betraying of his owne soule, by craftie vnrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eie, seeing from him, who is an infinite eie, we cannot hide them: Some Garlands wee may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed florile, dum loquimur, auescit; These flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selues, and become fearefull witnesses of our incestuous euils, did the reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept. Nihil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but about all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may bee a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is he aptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the budd of the hearbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which lieth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes, the whole world would then perill, and all returne to the first Chaos, darkenesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Caine perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of Men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might bee done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall law, before the law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. the fourth. If thou doest well shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, shalt thou not be rejected.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reimerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a volume of this subiect.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: it they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as euill (as of the first to desire to liue, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to bee that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preserve our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proofe, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man man is a being, Ens or Res: so hee doth desire good, and shunne euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Et hic l. 1. i. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalm approueth: Recte quidem Bonum definiunt, Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, wee desire the delights of euery sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with satietie, nor hurt vs with excess. For as Sense it selfe is for the preservation of life and being: so is it meete, cued by the law of nature, that the sensitiue appetite should not carrie vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) wee may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers lawes vnto them: In which sense the Civilians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to bee the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolemen admit not; that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it; where Plinian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Plinian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius naturae, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restraints the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selues: and the lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbideth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motiue facultie, which is but one, stirring vp to good, and declining the contrarie: secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obeying the law of nature increaseth. Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adueniente mandato peccatum reuixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by S. PAUL, When the Commandement came, sinne reuiued. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by S. PAUL, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not convenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right reason. And therefore, said DAMASCENE, homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrarie to nature: and S. AUGUSTINE, Omne vitium natura nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrarie vnto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enioy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

And though the law of nature command, that all things bee restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes this her law thee suffereth to be broken: as to denie a madde man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while hee was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to St. PAVL, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe.

Of the written Law of God.

After the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explanation of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine, and Humane. Again, the diuine positive law is double; the old and new: The old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere whenas Asiaticus or Asiaticus gouerned the Assyrians, Marathus the Syconians, Triopus the Argues, Cecrops Attica, and Acheres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham 430. yeeres. And this, it seemes, was the first written law which the world receiued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Grecians: nor not in Homers time: who liued after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was built downe 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his exprest will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight deficiencies of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of families might easily without any written law instruct their owne children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of nature did not define all kinds of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authoritie than other to the naturall law; In these respects it was necessarie, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the law was written, whereof these are the chiefe.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of DAVID, The law of the Lord is undefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessarie, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by DAVID it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the lawes of men, can so only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of inward motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by DAVID: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiōes hominum hominum nulle essent, nisi prius in mente dicenterentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot bee assured of; but the law of God bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also said DAVID, That the testimonie of the law of God is faithfull: giuing wisdom to children.

¶ VIII.

of the unwritten law of God, giuen to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

Now, that in all this long tract of time, betweene the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarchs of the first age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoeuer was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered over by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jewes afterward called Cabala, or Recepta: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserved in the bosomes of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being in dedde the diuine law reucaled to the Patriarchs; and from them deliuered to the posteritie, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam of Adamah, Earth, or red clay, hee gaue other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruits, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to cohabite with their Wiues, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and crueltie was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, *An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with crueltie through them: and behold I will destroy them * from the earth. I that offence theretore, for which all perished, could not be vnkowne to all that perished: Gods mercie and iustice interposing betweene the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God hath he made man.*

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithful, and the contrarie punished by the fathers curse, as Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall be vnto his brethren. Again, we finde that the vnaturall sinne of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree; as with fire from Heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rausiment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina: forcing: and by the

* The common reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the earth; and why may not this proposition in this place haue the same force, which it hath according to Isaiah, Gen. 4. 11. Item 44. 4. And Deut. 34. 1. especially, seeing the Hebrews are but a repetition of that which is said, ut. Delictum hominum de superis tollere. Gen. 9. 26.

Gen. 34. 25.

Gen. 3. 24. judgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar, That shee should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharao and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for shee is a mans wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise vp seede to his Brother that left a Widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not only to haue bene written in the hearts of men, before it was ingrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene 10 giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the law: so euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitively; Men by Reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessarie motions, without sense or perception,

§. IX.

Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of MOSES.

Now as the word (Law) in generall, as is afore said, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know what soeuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets, and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so Saint Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of mee in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by faith without the workes of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremite of law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not vnder the law, but vnder grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadowes and figures; as, The Law was giuen by MOSES, but grace and truth came by IESVS Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ; coming, it signifieth the whole policie of the Iewes Common-wealth; as, Before faith came, we were kept vnder the Law, &c. or the law of the order and institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets, and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied vnto IOHN. And if the Priesthood bee changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs bee changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the Law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the Written Law of MOSES, or the Law of the Old Testament, of which wee now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the mindes of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For according to Saint James, Whosoever shall keepe the whole; and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vied by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut opte peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quae est ultimus humanae vitae finis; The diuine law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessarie meane, whereby they may aptly attaine supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that guilt to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as Doe this for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Against the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for externall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremonie) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Iewes; and prescribeth orders for iustice and equitie. And therefore was it said of Saint Paul, The commandment is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall; holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the government of the common-wealth of the Iewes, in which manie things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the four kinde of things, of which it speaketh, to wit; Sacrifice; Holie things; Sacraments; and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruits of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments Circumcision, the Passouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meats, as not to eat the bloud and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyinges, anointings, and attire, as men were mixt garments of Linnen and Wollen; as also it prohibiteth other vnaturall and vnproper commixtions, as thou shalt not yoke together in a plough an Ox and an Asse, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth naturall compassion, and forbideth crueltie euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so forme referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest, nor beate downe the first buddes of the tree, nor mangle the labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moses; but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: fauing in the abilitie of iustifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to loue and worship God: and to vie charitie one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. Therein also are wee in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, and for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it foresignified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimonie of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church for some ceremonies and types of holy signification, which are still expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessitie.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vnuerfall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vic and externall oblation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Iewes Common-weale, and policie.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

5 for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine writtten Law, it may in effect bee reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignitie and worth of the law.
2. The Majestie of the law-giuer.
3. The propertie and peculiaritie of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniencie of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignitie of the Law is sufficiently proued by S<sup>t</sup>. Paul in these words, Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Majestie of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as hee hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he only gaue the law, who could only giue the end and reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministerie of Angels: as it is said. And the law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediatour: and in the Acts, He gaue the law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propertie and peculiaritie of the people, receiuing this law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disscuered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and scuered they were, because of Gods choise and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham, and his seede: not vnto his seedes, as to Esaue and Jacob, but to his seede, as to Jacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seede were the promises made: he saith not to the seedes, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conueniencie of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betweene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the law written in the Commandements, receiued by Moses in the worlds year 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time begunne the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniencie are formerly giuen.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiven, who taketh away the sinnes of the the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake, Gal. 4. beggerly as containing no grace, weake as not able to forgive and iustifie. The bloud of Goates and Bulls, and the ashes of an Heifir could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ bloud, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

¶ X I.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

He old and new Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation; as the old by workes, the new by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or obiect and remote end, they agree: which is, mans happinesse and saluation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the old, because it preceded the new Testament; which is an explanation of the old: from which the new taketh witness. Yet the new of more excellencie, in that it doth more liuely expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: in that he saith the new Testament, he hath abrogated the old. For the old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policie perishable: but the new was giuen in a promise of an euerlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalips, a Testament and Gospell for euer during.

The old Testament is called the law, because the first and chiefe part is the law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that law.

The new Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and chiefe part thereof is of the glad tidings of our redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or Storie of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Euangeliion signifying a ioyfull, happie, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometimetaken for a sacrifice, offered after victorie, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations: First, for glad tidings in general, as in Esay the 52. v. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained to signifie that most ioyfull message of saluation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the Historie of Christ: and so wee vnderstand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the Preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as Cor. 1. 9. v. 14. and Cor. 2. 8. v. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Danaus comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one couenant, one adoption, and one doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter is the end of our faith. For although it bee said, that Moses did promise by by obseruing the law an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and honie, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly hee raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrimes, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these died in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them as farre off and believed them: confessing that they were strangers and pilgrimes on the earth. To which purpose also S. AUGUSTINE: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissam terram eternam promitti. Few (saith hee) doe understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. HIEROME: Reluit Deus pascere Iudeos: non pecorum corporalibus donis opibique, ut Iudei somniant: God would not feede the Iewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches as themselves dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God and I will be your God. For the wordes, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit the safetie of their soules. For as God created both bodie and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncreed for, which liueth euer.

The agreement betweene the Old and New testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: the fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercie and saluation: to which the law seruing as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sinne and miserie, God sheweth his mercie and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwile if we seuer the law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith; the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law ternisheth, the Gospell allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The old restraineth the hand, the new the minde. Data est lex quae non sanaret (saith S. AUGUSTINE) sed quae agrotantes probaret; The law was giuen not to helpe but to discover sicknesse: and S. CRYSTOSTOME, Data est lex, ut se homo inueniret, non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaeretur; The law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby helpen: but that he might then seeke out the Physician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a sonne, of the greatest benefit was referred to be brought, as by the worthiest person, faith Cyri: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

THe seuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and ymoost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cur sed is is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of dutie to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law is, as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our selues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preferre, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equitie, and right, whereto we must conformance our selues.

The sense and vnderstanding of the law is double, literal and spiritual: by the littrell we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall the figures and mystikall fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the law, the same had being vntill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Crosse, then the Iewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadowes) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the myserie of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof the vaile of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and shadowes were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise then that it had not power to condemne according to the Iewish doctrine, as afore said. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe feuerly commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much reioyced, as he preferred the obseruation of the law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs; I haue bene delighted in thy law as in all manner of riches: And againe. The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that wee keepe his Commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomie witnesseth. *This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day is not hidde from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldest say who shall goe vp for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may doe it: neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, who shall goe ouer the Sea for vs, and bring it vs: &c. but the word is very nere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth and in thy heart for to doe it. Behold (saith MOSES) I haue se before thee this day life and death; good and euill, in that I command thee this day to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou maiest liue, &c. Neither is it said in vaine in S. MATTHEW. Si Cyprianus vis ad vitam ingredi serua mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandments: and in S. Iohn: Scio quia mandatum eius vita aeterna est; I know that his Commandment is life euerslasting. And if this be the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandments: certainly he is but a liar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it is not in mans abilitie, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandments, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow libertie, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them, from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedie of libertie) proposeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God; that wee keepe his Command-* ments, and his Commandements are not grievous. 1. JOHN 3. vers. 12. and if wee examine every precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the balance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to iudge, by what easie persuasions, we steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vse it against our pleasing desires.

¶ XIII.

Of the severall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

19

Or by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinites: and that it is of necessity that by this almighty Vnitie, all things haue bene caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creatour, and how in his prouidence he hath also provided for euery of them, which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

Tib. 147. 9.

Glossa in verb. calum.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatrie, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memorie of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the Deuill crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant soules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? for what doe wee thereby (saith the Wisedome of Salomon) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iourneys of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which hee praiech, be more senselesse: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

Wisd. 13. 17.

Tib. 135. 18.

The breach of the third Commandement is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, wee are no way allure to this horrible diddaine of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an advantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerslasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the Deuill brought vp among men, without all subtiltie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull advantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to neede, Adulterie to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemie, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world doe not vse it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither paine, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seuenth day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helplesse infancie, and bestowed on vs the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not doe the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectio inimica (saith BRACCON) imponit nomen operis tui; it is the affection and will that makes the worke such as it is. And certainly whoseuer cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vice of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from adulterie. Now, if the preservation of Virginitie haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue succie to this Infant, and nouerill warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

Nuptie repleneterram, Virginitas Paradisum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kind of violent robbery had bene vsed in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now-a-daies in England, and to the dishonour of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians, out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theuics, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, robbe, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man, or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouertishing whole families: and taking the bread and foode from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued, it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolue, but for a few yeares to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-bounds. And if euery man may presume to be pardoned once, there is no state or common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouertish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surerie of estate, and life, were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandements forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiues for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For although it be not easie to master all our fuddaine passions, yet we may restraine and hinder their growing, and further increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Couetising reacheth to all in it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of hauing: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selues by any our naturall frailtie, or vnadvised error; But

But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbred euill intent, or for some vrging inclination therunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vitious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as wee resist such motions they harme vs not: as they say, Quamdiu resagmur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not: and that then only they hurt when we suffer them to haue sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that wee may know the difference betweene this Commandement and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbredled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrarie passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if wee will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, we must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euen those which wee resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though hee that bridleth his euill desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man doe well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing hee ought not so much as to haue them at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinitie deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of Diuinitie to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth that the euill desires of the Continent man, that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a-pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull inducours to keepe his commandements, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe: wee may not safely giue libertie to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and commandements impossible for vs to keepe. For as he is accused (saith S. Hierome) that auowes that the law is in all things possible to be obserued: so hee hath made this addition. Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accused is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laid before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without censure, or without betraying of our selues, doe our faithfull inducours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfaignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, Dauid witnesseeth. Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy sight no flesh is iust shall be iustified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, who can say I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne grievous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether he giue way willingly, or restraîne himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his subject a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subject neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

§. XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessarie to be obserued.

And if we consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them, were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men, yet if we did not for our owne sakes strue to obserue these lawes: all societie of men, and all inducours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would bee taken away: and euery state and common-weale in the world fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might bee defended, that euery man might enioy the fruits of his owne traualle, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, wee might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of saluages. And hereof making our humane reason only Iudge, Lets fee the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if wee acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersitie of interpretation, hath already brought into the world, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, mettall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receiue thence-foorth, either helpe or comfort.

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeares require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and seuerely punished, the races of mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the libertie to destroy others, giueth libertie to others to destroy himselfe.

If adulterie were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe, this is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posteritie, no inducours by vertue and vnder-taking to raise families: murders and poisonings betwene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subject to most filthie and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perill, or lue as the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischiefe of robbes, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution foure-fold, policie of State and necessitie hath made it death.

To

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by coercion: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waiter against the wealthie: the idle begger and loiterer, against the carefull and painefull labourer: all trial of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The coueting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while wee couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we doe but couet; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wines or goods of our neighbours, wee can looke for no other, but that our felues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Whertin then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull and prouident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertilitie of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappie condition.

§. XV.

Of humane Law, written and vnrwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, viz. Written, and Vnrwritten. The vnrwritten consists of vsage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores; and hee defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae, to be customes approved by antiquitie or vnrwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a law: but yet <sup>30</sup> there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie, and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces.

The second are these pettie customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnrwritten.

The particular or pettie customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimonie of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornewale comprehending also the Stannerie of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin cules, are written in Devon, but not in Cornewale. But howeouer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought euery custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded vpon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith VLIAN) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time amendes not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessarie in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessarie continuance: it being manifest that euery custome, which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deedes, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they haue bene since continued, because posteritie is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued.

In Reg. Inuicior.
q. 117. m. 11.
V. p. 1. 29.

ued. For non sufficit simplex tolerantia. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam consuetudinem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome, against law: saue by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane Law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduifement of Wifemen, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione confistit. All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publique authoritie: prescribing necessarie obseruances to the subiect. That euery law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Nihil lex esse non videtur, quae iustitiam non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint. Greg. de Val. ex Tho. q. 91. art. 3. & 94. art. 2.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorised Magistracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the Government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutiones.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure <sup>30</sup> conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall. A. Part. 2. q. 9. 5. art. 2.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authoritie.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to THOMAS, Alia lex IULIA de Adulterijs, alia CORNELIA de Sicarijs; The law of IULIAN against Adulterie is one, <sup>40</sup> the CORNELIAN against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane law, generally taken, in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that VLIAN vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations: but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, <sup>50</sup> though not from an euident principle, yet so probable that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of ambassadors be granted betwene enemies, &c. which Nationall law according to diuers acceptations, and diuers considerations had of the Humane law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Civile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this law is not so immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates.

In Leg. 6. tit. ff.
de Iustitia Iur.

Hereof VLPPIAN, Ius civile, neque in totum a naturali. & gentium vocedit, neque per omnia ei seruit: itaq, cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus Iuri communi, In proprium, id est, Civile effusimus; The Ciuill law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of nature, and nations, nor yet in all points obay it: therefore, when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeares after the foundation of the Citie. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, and other Grecian lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and lawes Regall. The Regall lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regie, or Papirian, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquinius then reigning. For though so many of the former lawes as maintained Kingly authoritie were abolished, with the name: yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common villitie, were continued, and were a part of the lawes of the twelve Tables. To these lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gaue occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebiscita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate; which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall lawes: and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum: as those and the like Collections of Iustinian afterward were.

The difference anciently between Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglement, consisted in this, that lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraigne authoritie (be the soveraigntie in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Iustum Magistratus, vi. 20. leffe by authoritie it be made a law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith VARRO. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most vnto an Edict, say that it is a law for one yeare: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives: as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the Common-wealth: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Governance of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church, illud natura legem, hoc diuinum spectat; That respecteth the Law of nature, this the law of God. And so may Ius Civile be taken two waies: first, as distinguishing from the law of Nations, as in the first diuision: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Ciuill be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuill is a law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Ciuill, and all other lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular lawes, in vs among Christian Princes, and in Christian Commonweales, there are three kinds; the Ciuill which hath euerywhere a voice: and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spain besides the Law Ciuill, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Provinces. In France besides the Ciuill, the customes of Burgundie, Blois, Berri, Niueruois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouernees selon les costumes du dit Pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be gouerned according to the customes of that place.

There

M. 3. tit. 15.
C. Cij.

There are also in France the customes of Normandie, and these of two kinds: Generall, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these wordes. Nos autem, registram predictum, vsus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. Laudamus approbamus & autoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register afore said, laudable vses, and ancient customes, we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authoritie confirme. The common law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certain Maximes by those customes of the Realme approved. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England haue bene approved by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the law of the land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England that the eldest Sonne should inherit without partition: In Germanie, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all lands (that haue not bene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the house shall enioy the inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanishrie. For example, if a Lord of land haue foure Sonnes, and the eldest of those foure haue also a sonne, the three brothers of the eldest sonne, shall after the death of their brother, enioy their Fathers lands before the Grandchild: the custome being grounded vpon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times hauing alwaies liued in a subdiuided Ciuill warre, not only the greatest against the greatest, but euery Baron and Gentleman one against another, were inforced to leaue successors of age and abilitie to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Provinces of France, there are certaine peculiar, and pettie customes, besides the great and generall custome of the land, so are these 30 in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choise, and selue desire. Leges nulla alia causas tenent quam quod iudicio populi recepta sunt; The lawes doe therefore binde the subiect, because they are received by the iudgement of the subiect. Tum demum humane leges habent vnam cum fuerint non modo in scripta, sed etiam firmate approbatione communis: It is then that humane lawes haue their strength, when they shall not only be devised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to euery Christian law, that the same be honest, 40 that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Countrey; also for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of priuate profit, that it be written for the generall good. Hee also giues foure effects of the law, which Modestinus comprehends in two: to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former binds vs by feare, to auoide vice: the later incourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicerō. Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemq, virtutum; It behoueth the Law to bee a mender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold, the one constraineth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare 50 of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactiue, and Directiue.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, vrge vs to well-doing: laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euill, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum; Decline from euill, and doe good.

Psal. 36.

§. X V I.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane lawes, and in what sort.

10

NOW whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subject, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid, the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue, they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a preiudicial iudgement against himselfe: and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authoritie and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much about the lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is about a dead and senselesse carcase. For the King is truly called, Ius viuum & lex animata; An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authoritie to lawes, Princes both adde greatnesse to themselves, and conferre it, and therefore was it said of Bracton out of Iustinian, Merito debet Rex tribuere legi, quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King, for it is the law that doth make Kings.

Bract. 1.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine: and by humane lawes only declared to be Kings. As for the places remembered by the Diuines and Lawiers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God only.

Psal. 10.
ff. de Leg.

Tibi soli peccauit, saith DAVID; Against thee only haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be said to be subject to the law. Principes non subiiciuntur legi; For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the law humane is but *quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiue: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humana non pertinet: sed vis potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq. lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transfundendi aliquid; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kinde of organ, or instrument, of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold off: but the gouernour himselfe, in whom the gouerning power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for every actiue ability is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps sine legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the law. Therefore in the rules of the law it is thus* concluded. Subditi tenentur leges obseruare necessitate coactionis, Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leaue it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater abilitie. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be gouerned by. True it is, that all Nations haue their severall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill lawes did indeede containe in order, a great part of the then knowne world, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much vnto the natural customes of the sundrie people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion, or (as Afragolers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens; or peradventure some temper of the soile and climate, assisting matter of prouocation to vice (as plentie made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunitie to steale, makes the Arabians to bee Theues) very hard it were to forbid by law, with an offence so common, with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo vnhappy diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great furie rejected, because pluralitie of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, mee thinks, it were not amisse to consider, that the high God himselfe permitted somethings to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neare as may bee, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained, a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publique approbation, that the vertue oppoling it, would seeme as vncouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparell in Turkey: there may a wife and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his law required; as euenas the good King Hesekias did, in a matter meerely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people, The good Lord bee mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuarie: which praiere the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obserued by Master Doctor Willer, that the morall Iudicialls of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that we are tied to the same fueritie of punishment now, which was instituted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiuaged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemencie and Mercie, may abate of the fueritie of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauie: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospell.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath bene the subject of many

1. Chron. cap. 34.
v. 1. & 19.

many learned discourses, neither will I take vpon mee, to speake any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthie Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwaies bene very plausible. And surely, howsoever they bee not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and only law; yet shall wee hardly finde any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witnesse, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwark of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentle-woman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proote, for murdering her husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a yeare after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistis was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) grievously lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Author, Sapius ipse mihi falsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animam eius de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himselfe often confessed vnto mee, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphisiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the sciences themselves cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphisiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the only good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wiselome. To which purpose well saith Saint AUGUSTINE. Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens; illum ipsam consilium eternum, de qua nulli anima iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall lawes if he bee good and wise, doth therein consult the law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

The Storie of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law, to the death of MOSES.

§ I.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reverence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

WHEN Moses had receiued the law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuarie; hee mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seen what numbers of men, fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeares of age vpwards; hee appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole armie was 603550 able men for the warres, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Armie was diuided by Moses into foure grosse and mightie Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, bee called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Nasdon; in Issachar 54400. led by Nathanael: in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliah. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vanguard, and was the first that moued and marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incamping on the East side of the Armie; which was held the first place, and of greatest dignitie.

The second Battalion or Armie, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had ioyned vnto it Simcon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simcon 59300. vnder Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Elisaph. These had the second place, and incamped on the South side of the Tabernacle.

The third Armie marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elisbama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamliel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidam.

The fourth and last Armie, or Squadron, of the generall Armie, containing 157600. able men marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moued last, incamping on the North side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abieser: Asher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephthali 53400. vnder Ahira.

Besides

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses, Numb. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korab, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principall Mutiniers, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the twelue Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonells before spoken of, as by their names Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, tooke place not only in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was obserued. For Judah had the precedence and the greatest Armie, which also was wholly compounded of the sonnes of Lea, Jacobs wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Issachar, who in temporall blessings had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs prophetic) taking place before the Elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloved brother, the other sonne of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest sonne of Jacob Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Armie, according to Jacobs prophetic. Hee had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but only the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Leuites. Neare vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies, which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neare it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the mouable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; The Gershonites on the West, within the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Elisaph commanded, in number 7500. The familie of Cohath on the South side, guided by Elisaphan, within the Armie of Reuben, and betwene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third companie were of the familie of Merari, over whom Zurad commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side within the Armie of Dan; On the East side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the Leuiticall families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his succesor in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Armie of Israel, and of their incamping and marching: the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. Thereuere care, which Moses the Prophet and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and leaſt parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Santuarie, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industrie vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the leaſt part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the prouisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp and preserving the holie Vessels; the solemne remouing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degrec imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Familie, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Poperie, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: inſomuch as Time would faine bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines; and vnder the Hedges; and the Offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignitie and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-Government, left to newnesse of opinion and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: 10 euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancie with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inſomuch as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no leſſe variable than contrarie to it selfe, the Faith of men will soone after die away by degrees, and all Religion bee held in korne and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germanie cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adiuſſe uobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiuſſe, uobis condemnor: Quid fugiam video, sed quid ſequar, non habeo; If I adiuſſe my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; if I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you; what I should auoid I see, but I know not what I should follow.

Anabaptist

§. II.

The offerings of the twelue Princes: The Pasſeouer of the second year:
The departing of IETHRO.

Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessarie, provided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbered his Armie, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembered, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts: The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe covered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged therunto: the Sanctuarie excepted; which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sonnes of Korab, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the sonnes of Gershon and Merari.

Besides these Chariots each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a charger of fine silver, weighing 130. shekles: a silver Boll of 70. shekles: after the shekle of the Sanctuarie: and an incense-Cup of gold of ten shekles: which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their conquest: besides the beaſts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelue silver chargers, and twelue silver Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. shekles of silver: and the weight of gold in the incense-Cups, to 120. shekles of gold: which makes of shekles of silver 1200 euery shekle of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twentie pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Pasſeouer: which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second Moneth of the second year: and on the 20. day of the same the cloude was lifted vp from about the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this intocation to God, Rise up Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel remoned from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Param the the Armie, or great Squadron of Inda, led by Nasben, taking the Vantguard, followed by Nethanel, and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many Desarts and Mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing vnforethought which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father-in-law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompanie them in their journey towards Canaan: promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man as hee was of great vnderstanding and iudgement (as appeared by the counsaile he gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeares and experience, for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter: which was 42. yeares before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeares in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauaile: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of foules, which could not bee so few as a Million: it was necessarie to vse many guides and many conductors. To this request of Moses it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 2. 7. and Num. 10. 30. that Iethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not: for it is euident that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posteritie of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites: it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey was rather to fetch away his familie: and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the red Sea.

AFTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Desarts of Paran: and after three daies wandering, they sate downe at the Sepulchers of lust, afterward called Tabera, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers, which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second moneth, of the second yeare, they rested and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof surfaiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazereth: where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seven daies, after whose recouerie Israel remoued toward the border of Idumaea: and in-camped at Rithma, neare Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelue discouersers into the Territorie of Canaan: both to informe themselves of the fertilitie and strength of the Countrey: as also to take knowledge of the Waies, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad King of the Canaanites surpris'd diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neare those waies: through which the discouersers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discouersers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel: whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefites, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the Aegyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the victorie which hee gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preferred them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoile to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, That the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers, and Castles: that many of the people were Giantlike (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Amache) who were men of fearefull stature, and so farreouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutinie exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choosethem a Captaine (or as they call it now-a-daies, an Elefio) to carrie them backe againe into Egypt: so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished euery foule of the whole multitude (Iofia and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neare it, and at the mountaine foote of Iemua: which is but narrow, laying before them the fertilitie thereof: and assuring them of victorie. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense: they threatned to stone these encouragers to death: accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their bretheren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glorie betweene the vnadvised furie of the multitude, and the innocencie and constance of his seruants, preferred them thereby from their violence: threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) praied vnto God to remember his infinite mercies: allcedging that this so seuer a iudgement, how deservfully soeuer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations: and giue them occasion to vaunt that the God of Israel failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Desarts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire: the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heauie than hoped for, he scourged this iniquitie, so by the measure of his glorie (euermore jealous of neglect and derision) hee suffered not the wicked to passe vnpunished; reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, hee was pleased to preserve, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer beene frustrate.

§. IIII.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moses had reuiled the purposes of God to the people: and made them know his heauie displeasure towards them: they beganne to bewaile themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrarie againe to the aduise of Moses: who assured them, that God was not now among them: and that the Arke of his couenant should not moue, but by his direction, who could not erre: and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death: and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwaies follow those counsells which carrie them to their owne destructions: so the Hebrewes after they had forsaken the opportunitie by God and their Conductors offered: and might then haue entred Iudaea before their enemies were prepared and ioynd: did afterward, contrarie to Gods commandement, vnder take the enterprise of themselves: and ranne headlong and without aduise into the mountaines of Idumaea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioynd and attending their aduantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victorie and pursuite, consumed them all the way of their flight euen vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrowe at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assemblie of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioynd together for their common safetie) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For hee commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the deserts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the bankes of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came backe to passe ouer Jordan there were consumed 38. yeares: and the whole number of the fixe hundreth and odde thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses Ishua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and carelesse generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children: which were increased to 600000. and 23 more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discouersers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermaunded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Isralites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times it is proued out of fundrie other places.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commandement receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From thence hee went on to Lihnah, taking that name of the frankincense there found. From Lihnah hee crost the valley, and fate downe at Refsa neare the foot of the mountaine. And after hee had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceelata: where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabaath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwaies keeping the valley, between two great ledges of mountaines (those which bound the Desert of Sin, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceelata; and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth manzion. From thence hee passed on to Huada; then to Macloloth; and then to Thobub; and so to Thara or Thare: the foure & twentieth manzion. Where while Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutinie, of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram: who for their contempt of God and his Ministers were some of them swallowed vp alive, and by the earth opening her mouth deuoured, others euen two hundred and fiftie which offered incense with Korah were consumed with fire from heauen; & 14700. of their partie, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest meruailes and iudgements of God, that hath bene shewed in all the time of Moses his government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authoritie, were suddenly swallowed vp alive into the earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrowe the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church and Common-weale of his people. And the better ter to allure the people, and out of his great mercie to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rodde giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euery Head and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and drie Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron on that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable Spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ake one night, had on it both Buds, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

10 From Tharab the whole Armie removed to Methra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit after S. Hierome) and from Moseroth to Benecian; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Ietabata, the thirtieth Manzion; where from certain fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betwene Madian and Afiongaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at Afiongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer, in Arabia the Stonie, which he calleth Curya, from whence (saith he) the Inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia relieth the Armie of Cambyfes: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these springs at Gadgad, or Ietabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Manzion. For it was at Punon, that those springs are spoken off, which in Dent. the 10. v. 7. is also called Ietabata, or Ietabath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the Riuer Zared, the next adioyning. And that these springs should fall into the Red Sea at Afiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleue, for the way is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandie parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles; yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirstie sand, before they can recouer the bankes of the Red Sea.

30 From Ietabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrons; and from thence to Efiongaber: which Citie in Iosephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieromes Eflia. From thence keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North as he was by God commanded: Efiongaber Deut. 28 being the farthest place towards the South-east, that Moses trauelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Efiongaber or Afiongaber, Elath and Madian were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, neare the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Efiongaber, and the other places neare the Red Sea, had at this present bene subiect to the Idumeans, Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places: for it is said. And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumaea into Egypt, when he fled from Israh. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that he made a nauie of ships in Efiongaber besides Elath, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and the accidents while they abode there.

10 From Efiongaber he turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh (or in Beniamin) of the children of Israh; where they fate downe in the first Month of the fortieth yeare after they left Egypt. For at the next Manzion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fortieth yeare: the nine and thirtieth tieth year taking end at Eziongaber. And at this Citie of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neare it, died Miriam or Marie, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seen in Saint Iheromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcitie of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the earth; by the suddaine pestilence which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and calling vngreatfully on Moses all their misaduentures; yea though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning, so his mercies being without end; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattails were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place: therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the trauales of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was depouled of the Garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but God receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more scene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuter. 10. vers. 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumians had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the feuen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Eziongaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hejmana, and before he came to Beniacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister died; the first being the feuen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue bene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neare Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East 40 part Horeb. By the West part Moses incamped, as he past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent Messengers to the Prince of Idumaea, praying him that hee might passe with the people of Israel through his Territorie into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the Citie of Kadesh, where Moses then incamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commaunded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumaea hereto, Moses remembered him, that he was of the same race and familie with Israel: calling him by the name of Brother, because both the

Edomites

Edomites and Israelites were the Sonnes of one Father, to wit, Isaac, anffering thereby; that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esaue his Ancestor had made warre; and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient race defended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir; calling it by his owne name Edom; or Edumaea. Hee also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or walle his Countrie, but that hee would restraine his Armie within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high waies, paying money for whatsoever he vsed; yea euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattails should drinke. For Moses was commanded by God not to prouoke the children of Esaue. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his owne Countrie, the same being neare Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountains: and with all suspecting, as a naturall wise man; that 600000. Strangers being once entred his Countrie, it would rest in their wills to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means: And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his countrie together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For as it is written: Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mightie power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe, who was of a naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of warre that the world had, he refused to aduenture the Armie of Israel against a Nation, which being ouer-come, gaue but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the state of their mountainous Countrie, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendered them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumaea, and traoueling to Arnon; the border of Moab.

HE therefore leauing the way of Idumaea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Edumaea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrie, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victorie, had Moab bene enforst first to haue made his way by the sword through Idumaea, and thereby, though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolute to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Armie; which, for the multitude, occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattle that they draue with them, could not incampe so neare together, but that some quarter or other was euer more subiect to surpris. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which

Num. 33. 45.

loyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Armie were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuter. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victorie ouer Israel, neare Cadesbarne, or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue beene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, hee would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compass, by the Riuer of Zared and Arnon.

Num. 33. 40.

Neither is their coniecture to bee valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabite any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territorie lay without it, and neare the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victorie pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Iudaea. There is also a Citie of that name in Simon. But there is no such placeto the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutinie which followed presently after the repetition of this victorie, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sacked the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water, and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had passd Jordan: Iosua then governing them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie so called; and with him the King of Hevra: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And hee nameth them amongst those Kings, which hee vanquished and put to death.

Now after this assault and surpris by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, heeled the people Eastward to compass Idumaea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entranee by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, beganne againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fire Serpents. (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leauing the ordinarie way which lieth betwene the Red Sea, and Cadesbarne, incamped at Zalmone: and thence hee remoued to Phunon, where hee erected the Brazen Serpent; making these iourneys by the edge of Edumaea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall Citie of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Vers. 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither neither did they march (according to FONSECA) per viam, qua habet a laterem mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeede they croit, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Eziongeber; Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to thunne the border of Edom, and to take the vmoit East part of Moab, croit the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territorie of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Supha Countrie bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; From thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the Riuer of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing past that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet ca. 48. v. 22. calleth the House of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnessar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and incamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblahaim, but speaketh of his remoue from the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon, calling Arnon the border of Moab, betwene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Countrie at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Salad Peer then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent Messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrie: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to giue a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vnderooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet hee had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Seon obserued the same precept, which he left to his posteritie, and successours, for a law of the war, namely in Deut. 20. v. 10. in these wordes, When thou comest neare vnto a Citie to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee, but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the Males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of Armies haue obserued to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this storie, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture which are lost.

Now concerning the Warre betwene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this storie to that Booke entituled Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes; and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater breuities in this place. His wordes after the Genea translation are these. Wherefore it shall be spoken in the booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things hee did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuer of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint varie. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said Num. 37. In the booke: the Warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brookes of Arnon. Iosius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genea and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Supha, a Countrie bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as hee coniectureth. The Text heradeth thus. Idcirco dicit solet in recessione bellorum IERHOVA, contra VAHEBYM in Regione SYPH: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it

spoken in repeating of the battailes of Iehovah, against Vahab in the Countrey of Seph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which wordes he vnderstandeth, that amongst the Warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memorie in the mouth of most men, concerning the Warre of Sehon against Vahab, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neare Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vahab was the immediate Predecessour of Balaac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balaac was the sonne of Zippor, and not of Vahab. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were electiue, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall booke be meant; and if any; whether it bee not a prediction of Warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the booke of Judges. Siracides c. 46. tells vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Io sva. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few wordes, referring the Reader to other bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a booke as this there was; wherein the fuerrall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue bene destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the bookes of Henech, howsoever they haue bene in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddaeus, and cited by Origen apud Epiph. and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The bookes remembered by Iosua c. 10. v. 13 and in the second of Samuel c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iahser, or Iustorum, is also lost; where in the slay of the Sunne and Moone in the middelt of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still, till Israel had auenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also Dauid tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Iuda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according to the 69. Psalm v. 28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the booke of life, neither let them be written with the righteous. HiEROME thinks, that Dauid by this booke vnderstood those of Samuel, Rabbi Salomon, that the bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Iacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentarie vpon Iosua by an vnknowne Author.

The booke of Chocai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 19. Of this booke, also lost, HiEROME conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Storie of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Ierobam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieda the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these haue the bookes of Semaiah and of Iddo, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Ishai the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomons which the Hebrewes write Hafarim, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum only remaineth, 1. Kings 4. 32. and with this diuers other of Salomons workes haue perished, as his booke of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1. Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Iosephus, HiEROME, Cedrenus, Cicero Asculanus, Petrus Mirandula, and others.

Of

Of these and other bookes many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Iherusalem. But let vs returne thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot: and of the Giants in those parts: and of SEHON and OG.

Hen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposit to the Citie of Nebo, leauing the Citie of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing vpon the Moabites on that side.

For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South side of Arnon, hauing lost all his ancient and best Territorie, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to prouoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently posselt by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sonnes of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zam-zummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, euen to the Desert of Arabia, aswell on the West, as on the East side of the Mountaines of Gilead, were inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We finde also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many families of Giant-like men.

For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the Citie of Arbah, which Arbah in Iosua is called the Father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also bene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief Citie was Araer or Ar, neare the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zam-zummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chief Citie was Rabbat, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Virrobusti, horrendly Gigantes; Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hem, in the same Prouince, and not farre to the North of Araer.

Now Moses hauing past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proude by his former conquest vpon Vahab the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and vslurpers, (themselues being of the sonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speede as he could, because Moses incamped in the Countrey of his new conquest; to wit, the Plaines of Moab; the two and fortieth and last Mansion? which Moses waisted with the multitude of his people, and cattle. Towards him therefore hauing himselfe, they encountered each other at Iahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victorie so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. Hee also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Esebon, and also of the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites.

And although Israel might now haue taken a ready way and passage into Iudea: being at this time, and after this victorie at the banks of Jordan: yet hee knew it to bee perilous perilous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basjan or Tracanis: and therefore he led on his Armie to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the only man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying between the mountaine of Herman (which mountaine saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shiron, and the Amorites Shenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell vnto the King of Basjan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and posselt. After this Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the mountaines of Abarim, left the persecution of that warre vnto Iair the sonne of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basjan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Geshuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Hauath Iair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse posselt the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was giuen to Ruben and Gad.

§. IX.

Of the troubles about the Midianites, and of Moses his death.

FTER these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Mosh, the Midianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balaam King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) sought according to the aduise of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuide them both in Loue and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beat them out of Mosh, and the Countries adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer bene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, wherof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandement put to the sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simconites, together with Cobbi a Daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindeesse of this all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes became an Idolater) as hee forgave the rest of Israel, and slaid his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbered the third time: and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601 730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that fought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatrie. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately bene, the vassalls of Sehon, as appeareth by Iosuah. These five Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar were at this time but the vassalls of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eur, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Iosua. Hee slew also all the men, male-children, and women: slaying such as had not yet vied the companie of men, but those they slaid and disperst them among the children of Israel to serue them.

And Moses hauing now liued 120. yeares, making both his owne weakenesse of body body knowne to the people, and his vnabletie to trauaile: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the spirit of God: from whom he receiued a new commandement to ascend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render vp his life: Hee haisted to settle the Gouvernement in Iosua: whom hee perswaded with most liuely arguments to prosecute the conquest begunne, assuring him of Gods fauour and assistance therein. And so hauing spent these his later daies after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law (or an iteration of the Law, according to S. Augustine) vnto both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: which hee often repeated vnto them; thereby to confirme them in knowledge, loue, feare, and seruice, of the all-powerfull God: Hee blessed the twelue Tribes, that of Simcon excepted, with seuerall and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatnesse and goodnesse of him, vnto whom in his prayers he commended them: Hee also commanded the Priests to lay vp the booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that hee indited was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken yee Heauens and I will speake, and let the earth heare the word of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrowes of this life, vnto that rest which neuer afterward hath disquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day, which happened in the yeare of the World 2554.

§. X.

Observation: out of the Storie of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

OW let vs a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundrie of the great euents, which haue bene mentioned in this Storie of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles; his promise; and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall find that the feare which Pharao had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose prouidence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharao's owne Daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the Conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed Brethren, and the ouerthrower of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation; euen then, when he sought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder and burie them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to flee into Midian: the contention betweene the sheep-herds of that place, and Iethro's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitarie life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the world, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Herd-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein hee first suffered him to liue many yeares, the better to know the waies and passages through which hee purposed that hee should conduct his people, toward the Land promised:

promised: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his Will and diuine Pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Storie of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeares after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Iosua, with the summe of the Historie of Iosua.

§ I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to haue Warre, were diuers waies, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we looke to the qualitie of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward: we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmitie: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edemites, Mosabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuerſitie in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serue for such purposes as God had referred them for. To make these things more manifest, we must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with *one familie, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: by proceſſe of time diuided into severall families and names: whereof

some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzzi, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Iebusites, Amorites, Heuites, Etites, and others; who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrie in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another familie, and strangers in that Countrie: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now euen they which descending from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those partes, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they dayly contracted affinity: than of their olde pedigree from Abraham.

True it is that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possessed themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to bee equall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great families of the Mosabites, and Amorites: of Eſau the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue been a tribe of Edom, because Eſau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth it to haue bin otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed and endlessse warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest Sonne Naboth springing the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabathians. Now euen as Abraham besought God to bleſſe Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Haurath vpon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petrea. Yet howeuer the strength of these later named nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: yet it is not vnlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these families before named, were not so vnited, in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for Dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood a-part or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preservation, to ioyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumeans only denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Mosabites durst not deny: because their Countrie lay more open; and because themselves had lately beene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Countrie lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Basan. Again, that which moued the Mosabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his Confederate: was that the Mosabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying betwene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Mosab

* It seemeth also that Huz, the Sonne of Nachor, & Buz, his Brother, planted themselves in the Eastside of Jordan about Bas, where they finde the Land of Huz: in which both Isid dwelt, as one of the issue of Huz the Sonne of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend, which is called a Buz. See hereafter Chap. 10. §. 7.

Mosab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he beganne to practise with Balac against Israel, and by the Daughters of Moab, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at length the Mosabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred up to enmitie against Israel. And as for sinners of the rest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, wee may note, how in the beginning, betwene the Authors of their Perigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were prefaces of future quarrells, which in the posteritie might bee the easier incensed, by the memorie of old grudges: and withall by somedisdaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses being naturall men, might come to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselves, to their inferiours, as they tooke it, and for a more aggravation the issues of Esau Princes of Edumaea, might keep in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacobs taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his Fathers blessings also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised into Seir or Idumaea.

So also in the posteritie of Israel, it might remaine as a seede or pretence of enmitie, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his Mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieue them. Israel also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumaeans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau tooke two Wives of that Nation: one of them was Adah, the Daughter of Elou, the Hittite, and the other Abolibamah, the grand-child of Zibzon the Hewite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name Edom or Edumaea.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceffe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those Wives of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, wherof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

TH E Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Perigree) wee finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirtie remembered by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Henuites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God had appointed that the seuen principall Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Iordah, on the East; and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemar of the Henuites, whom Simcon and Leui slew, together with his Sonne Sicheu, in reuenge of their Sisters rauishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the Dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they incamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumaea.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea or Nabuthaea, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses ouer-threw in the plaines of Moab: at which time he tooke Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which victorie, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betwene the Mountaines Tracon or Galaad and Iordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fift was Adonizedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hobam, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Larnuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some Dominion ouer the rest, for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before-times was the head of all those Kingdomes.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confess that he cut off the thumbs of the hands, and feete, of 70. Kings, forcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who after Iuda and Simcon had viue the same execution vpon himselfe; acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom hee oppressed twentie yeares, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (incouraged by Debora) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the Wife of Heber the Kenite, a naile driuen into his head while hee slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabuthaea: to the South east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethogelus or Iethreus, faith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iecanis, or Iokhan, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter, or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I haue spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his Father: and this Hobab had seuen Daughters. Hee guided Moses in the Wilderness: and became one of the Israelites: of him defended the Kenites so called of his Father Raguels surname of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembered.

At such time as Saul inuaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gaue them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong fortresses, and liued in the mountaines of the Desarts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named were these.

1. Hemor the Heuie of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizelek the Jebusite, King of Hierusalem
6. Hobam of Hebron
7. Piram of Iarmuth
8. Iapia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Iabin of Hazor
11. Jobab of Modon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek and
13. Iabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the MADIANITES these.

After the death of Barak, Judge of Israel, the foure last named of these Medianite Kings, vexed Israel seven yeares: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. & 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursue of the rest Gideon himselfe laid hands vpon Zebub and Salmunna, or Salmunna, and executed them, being prisoners, in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their Confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

IF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according to 40 the promise of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hailah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Shur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cetur, that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue bene, and so were the Medianites;) themselves taking possession of a better soile in Arabia the Happie, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petraea. For Nabath the eldest of those 50 twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea, which was very fruitfull though adioyning to the Desart, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathaea: the same which neighboureth Iudea on the East side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happie, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathes (B) changed into (P).

Kedar

Kedar, the second of Ismaels Sonnes, gaue his owne name to the East part of Basar, or Balanea, which was afterward possit by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the Mountaines Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie Cedarani.

Adbel, fate downe in the Desart Arabia, neare the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happie: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomie calleth Agubens.

Misbam, was the Parent of the Mesamancuses, neare the Mountaine Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happie.

- 10 The Raahens were of Nisflma: who ioyned to the Orchens, neare the Arabian gulfe, where Ptolomie setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumians, betweene the Adubens and Raahens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Masfa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athritae, who bordered the Nabatheans in the same Happie Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the Citie of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Iturians, or Chamathens: of whome Tobu was King in Dauids time.

- 20 Of Naphri the Nubcian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whome Adadesez Plin l. 6. c. 28. commanded, while Dauid ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmoians: who were afterward called Asita: because they worshipped the fire with the Babyloni Ionians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aretas, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: Exod 17. when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

- 30 Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neare Cades: Num 14. b. After the Gouernement of Othniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barak with the Madianites: and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Hailah to Shur.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simeon: but Dauid followed them, and surpris- 1. Sam. 30. fed them, recovering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, 2. Sam. 8. 12. they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse.

- 40 In Ezekies time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were wasted and displanted 1. Chron. 4. by the children of Simeon.

§. IIII.

Of the insaturation of ciuilitie in Europe about these times, and of PROMETHEVS and ATLAS.

Here liued at this time, and in the same age together with Adoser, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuilitie (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) beginne at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudea. For if Pelagus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Aradia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine

and forme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part by Hearbs and Rootes: we may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how fallly those Nations haue vaunted of that their antiquities accompanied not only with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge, And it was in this age of the World, as both Ensebius and S. Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctus fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of Wisdome: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to PROMETHEVS, Ad inuents sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iapeters fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that hee had the art so to vse this fire, as thereby hee gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire hee had to inuigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heavenly bodies, for so it is said: Idem altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno celo quam longissime astrorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That hee ascended Caucasus, to the end that hee might in a cleare skie discerne a farre off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expound it otherwise, and others diuerfly.

Of this mans knowledge ÆSCHYLVS giues this testimonie.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeares after Ogyges. Porphyrus saies that hee liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Ysaac. There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the Sonnes of Iapetus, of whome though it bee said, that they were borne before Moses daies, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date; yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among Men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these Sonnes of Iapetus, Aeschylus findes two other, to wit: Oceanus, and Hesperus, who, being famous in the West, gaue name to the Euening, and so to the euening euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Idea, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memorie Plato in Critias beflowes on Atlas, the Sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas sustinere caelum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellarum Cephrys cum Pyro traditur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabula transiisset; Neither should ATLAS be said to beare up heauen, nor PROMETHEVS to be fastened to Caucasus, nor CEPHEVS with his wife to be steepled, vnlesse their diuine knowledge had raised vpon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime hee tooke him for Sature; as Rheconius alme Promethen. But that the Storie of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Ensebius and S. Augustine haue not doubted, For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomie, saith S. Augustine, were his Daughters called by the names of constellations; Pleades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archas the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the inuention. Of this Archas Arceadia in Peloponessus tooke name, and therefore did the Arceadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that below the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacus Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities gaue it Atlas of Lybia: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequaled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophie.

§. V.

Of DEUCALION and PHAETON.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argues. This Deucalion (Cem. Alex. Strabo lib. 1.) was the Sonne of Prometheus, saith Heraclitus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for Mother, the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifthenth of his Odyssees makes Deucalion the Sonne of Atmos: but he must needs haue meant some other Deucalion; for else either Pysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Pysses after his returne from Troy faimed himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus; who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Atmos: but this Minos liued but once before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that Warre) and this Deucalion the Sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect euery soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his Wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impietie of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule sinnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and crueltie of all mankind drew on them that general destruction by the flood Vniuersall. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice, and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

*Non illo melior quisquam, nec amantior aqua
Iris fuit: aut illa reuerentior vlla deorum.*

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any Woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing: and aduised him to provide for his safetie: who herupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium: and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Doue, to discouer the Waters fall and decreafe, I should verily thinke that this Storie had bene but an imitation of Noahs flood deuiſed by the Greekes, did not the times ſo much differ, and S. Auguſtine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this Storie of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melanio on whom Neptune is ſaid to haue begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, forrenowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and meruailous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phaeton: not only in Ethiopia, but in Iſtria, a Region in Italie, and about Cuma, and the Mountaines of Teſtulus: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of HERMES TRISMEGISTVS.

BVt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned: the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus: and of the Greekes Hermes.

Many there were of this name: and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Auguſtine and Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercurius which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercurius, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clement, Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the Sonne of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to viter, as the Iewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercurius, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to haue deliuered literature to the Egyptians, and to haue giuen them Lawes. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercurius which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercurius, otherwise Thoth; whom Philo Biblius writeth Tautus; the Egyptians Thoth; the Alexandrines Thot; and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Tautus, Sanconiathos, who liued about the Warre of Troy, giues the inuention of letters. But S. Auguſtine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he finds this Mercurius, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives vpon S. Auguſtine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembered. But that consisture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercurius brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any any truth in prophane antiquitie) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Græcians into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betwene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argiues, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeare Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus who reigned eleuen yeares; after him Danaus fiftie yeares; after him Lyneus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Cyrene, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom S. Auguſtine remembereth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters, and taught the vse of them to the Iewes; of whom the Phœnicians their Neighbours receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Iewes and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For every Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercurius, vpon part of whose workes he Commenteth, to haue bene foure descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercurius, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsailler and Instructor of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giueth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercurius instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vives vpon the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of S. Auguſtine, De Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercurius, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. Sanconiathos, an ancient Phœnician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercurius; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saurine, and called by the Phœnicians, Tautus; and by the Egyptians Thoth, or Thoty. It may bee, that the many yeares which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeares, gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Egyptian Wisedome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurius or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested, yet whoseuer shall reade him with an euen iudgment, will rather resolve, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit dictated. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a like more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had bene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not bene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Egyptians in Theologie hereafter written, was deuiſed by the first, and more ancient Mercurius; which others haue thought to haue bene Ioseph, the sonne of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Sapienter phane, which is as much to say, as abconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous turous opinions. For what this man was, it is knowne to God. Enuie and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him : of whom, whosoever were, Lactantius writeth in this fort. *Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, ipsamque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec hath written many Bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which he affirmeth the maiestie of the most high and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we doe. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrarie are these his acknowledgments to those idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whosoever is found in him contrary therunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim eius esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding being most perfect, and generatiue, and operatiue, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) præuidit 10

In Prof. Istoru.
 Trium.

To this I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volateran out of Syrus. *Hactenus filii pulsus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior: ad quam vniuersi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui cives suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam hec, quam multi vitam excusant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Eiherto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Countrie, I haue lined a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safetie. And when I shall after a few daies (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and bloud depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or fadeth his Citizens with a sweetnesse more than meruailous: in regard whereof this being which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death, than a life. The other and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense 40 not in wordes with Syrus. *O caelum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiuro per vniogenitum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei; I adiure thee O heauen thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercie vpon me.

But Suidas hath his inuocation in these wordes: Obtestor te caelum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primum, cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per vniogenitum sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto; I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, 50 which he spake first when he established all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

p. VII.

Of IANNES and IAMBRES, and some other that liued about those times.

Here were also in this age both Asculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vines thinks in his Commentarie vpon Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer haue beene heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiaritie with Deuils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth; how euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophists or Venefices and Incantatores, Sophists, poisoners, and Inchanters: by Hierome Sapientes & malefici, Wise men, and euill doers: and so by Vatablus, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them magicians, workers by drugges. The Genenau, Sorcerers and Inchanters: lunivus Sapientes, Præstigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one sense: and Præstigiators are such as dazell mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapies. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorcerers appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to bee one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Deuill changeth himselfe into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrarie euery worke which surmounteth the Wisedome of most men, is not to be condemned as performed by the helpe or ministerie of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where hee also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and aboue nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beseftis, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisedome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis; The Wisedome of diuinitie: the one Iacob practised in breeding the pied Lambs in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection; to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him both which he vseth to his glorie, that gaue them: assuming to himselfe nothing at all; either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth that from the time that Moses left Egypt to the death of Iosua; diuers other famous men liued in the world, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inuentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Græcians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musickall plaies to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrennesse and scarcitie vpon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erichonius institute the like games to Xinerna: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oile, in memorie of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Eurota: and begat on her Kadamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same, to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia a Citie of Peleponnesus: (or as others say, only nursed and brought vp there) who came into Italie, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules.

cules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Egyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith Philostatus) It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which traualled as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanius built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy fouer they were that liued in the daies and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) hee fo often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angells; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge; neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posteritie by letters, the truth and power of One infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of idolatrie, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed it.

Syrac. 45. 13. 3.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glorie, caused him to heare his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness, and meeknesse, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic by Megasthenes and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembered by Moses, Eustius, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Elanicus, Aufulaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall flood which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Eustius, and Sybilus haue approued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth so the very fame of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the Citie called Camerina, or Frien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrologie of the Chaldeans was inuented. Is iustitia pietateq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) se Deo gratus fuit, et diuino precepto in Phœnicem venerit ibiq; habitauerit; for his iustice and pietie he was so pleasing vnto God, as by his Commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Booke and fifth Chapter speaketh reuerently of Moses. There are many other among prophane Authors, which confirme the bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparatione to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimonie of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words.

Strabo. l. 16.

Moses enim affirmabat, docebatq; Egyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Dys hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cælum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius perfectæ imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alienius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem auderet fingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effigione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum. Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattail: Also that the Africans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shape of men: whereas that only is God in deede, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likeness of those things; which are amongst vs: That therefore (all denying of Idoll cast aside) a worthy

Temple

Temple and place of priuer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his workes and wordes; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Jamblicus, Philo Iudeus; and Eusebius Casarensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguished into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick; the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For Geometrie, which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsfull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nile, were yearly ouerflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a leuell and spacious Plaine, free and cleare from cloudes, yielded them delight with ease, in obseruing and contemplating the risings, fillings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied: because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired further knowledge; than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine fount heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceede and bee from mutations in the aire; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Egypt; partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Sommer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nile giueth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and others Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue bene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victorie, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they prevailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Egyptians Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to bee concealed from the vulgar sort, were obfured.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this latter Egyptian learning into three severall sorts, viz. Epistolæ, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotalis, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacerd; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figurative wordes; as for example, where it is written: The Isis by the Hornet participateth the beautie of the Hawke; which is red thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of diuine beautie; the other symbollicall, or by signatures, which is three-fold, viz. Imitatie, Tropical, and Enigmaticall: Imitatie, which designeth things by characters, ractions, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sunne; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropical or Transfrent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods and of Men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird this signifieth the Moone: by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skillfullnesse: by a Lyon, Fortitude: by a Horse, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudencie: by a Filth, Hatred is to be vnderstood: Ænigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth, that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Aire, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eie, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Governing all things. The Scythians are reported to haue bene delighted with this kinde of writing. For Phereides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthurā, King of the scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthurā returned to him a Moufe, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagus, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the Moufe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their aire: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made an other construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his Men did hasten away, as a Bird through the aire, or creepe into holes as a Moufe, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, till his grounds. The same Historie is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part which is Morall, and Politique, doth containe especially the Laynes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Alepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinitie, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not only to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Tamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Solomon and Menatus, affirmeth that this Mercurius was not only the Inuentor of the Egyptian Philosophie, but of all other learning, called the Wisedome of the Egyptians before remembered: and that he wrote of that subiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fierie Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aerall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptian language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greeke, they seemed to haue bene first written in that tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisedome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physick fixe bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrologie foure.

§. VIII.

A Brieft of the Historie of IOSVA: and of the space betwene him and OTHONIEL: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to IOSVA: and of the breach of Faith.

FTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the Egrefc in, the first month called Nisan, for Israhel, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisedome, tooke on him the Gouvernement of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Jordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosuas rule St. Augustine dates with the raigne of Aminas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Coras the thirteenth King in Sicenia, when Danaus governed the Argiues; and Erichonius, the Athens. Lib. 18. de ciu. Da. c. 11.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent out Jordan certaine discouersers to view the feat and strength of Jerico, the next Citie vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which hee was to passe ouer. Which discouersers being faued, and sent backe by Rahab, a Woman of ill fame, because shee kept a Tauerne or Visting house, made Iosua know, that the Inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Countie about it, hearing of the approach of Israel had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egrefc, Iosua remoued from Sittim in the Plaines of Moab, and drew downe his Armie to the banks of the Riuer Jordan; and gaue them commandment to pur themselves in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer: giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and presence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Jordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters coming from aboue should stand still in a heap; whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with drie feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and the Countie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice & equalitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth, and on the tenth day of the first Moneth Nisan or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the middle of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Jerico, where they incamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue commandment, that all borne in the last fortieth year in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had bene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thom. u excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damasceus, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselves and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passeouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countie, and hauing, as it were, surfeited on Nam, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And

And as Moses beganne to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Shihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition, and distribution, was not doneat once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth year of his government: proued in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other fouen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set downe in his owne bookes, as I shall not neede to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Regulz of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouvernours God hath taken away all wilddom and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves and to their owne defences: hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so far as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendered themselves to Iosua. Only five (the rest looking on to see the success) namely the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to scape by flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caeue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victorie hee also tooke Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua possesst himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possesst, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings, and People made duitt: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the ouer-late counsailes of necessity, vnited themselves, to make one grosse strength and bodie of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practis'd and gathered together, being at that time of all the Canaanite Kings the most powerfull; which Armie being by Iosua discouered, as the same rested neare the Lake of Merom, hee vs'd such diligence, as he came on them vnawares; and obtaining an absolute victorie ouer them he prosecuted the same to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities: of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skillfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vs'd the stratageme of an ambush in taking of  Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon, by surpris. For he march'd all night from his camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when they suspected no enemy at hand: as hee did also at Asteram, when he ouerthrew Iabin, and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victorie, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuier of Jordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel pass't it with a drie foot; the fall of Ierico by the sound of the Hornes; the shewers of 50 Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished, than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those, which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no distinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnesse, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Aequiuocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, expressly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiuers, and counterfeiters, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by feining to bee sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrey, in which traualle their clothes were worne; their brend mouldie, which they auowed to haue bene warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrells and bottles of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their thighs rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing sworn vnto them by the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though vr'd by the murmure of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandement which hee receiued from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which hee had granted to them. Secondly, he might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there bee any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites that hee gaue peace, because hee knew them to bee a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that hee gaue faith, and to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleued what they had said, and counsaile'd not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and seru'd those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witnesse of the true God, in whome they beleued not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue seru'd himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee neede not in this case the helpe of Aequiuocation, or Mentall Reseruation. For what hee sware, hee sware in good Faith; but hee sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises hee made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom hee had sworn it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that wee therein neglect: wee therein professe that wee feare him not, and that wee set him at nought and despise him. If hee that without Reseruation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promising in his name, and makes him a witness of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or King dome, to breake those Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publique faith. For though it were 400. yeares after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gileonites: yet God who forgot not what the Predecessours and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to referre in silence contrarie intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subiects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassalls to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not onely be made vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby freemen are tied in the world, be torne a sunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies. It is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his wordes are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the feuerie of Gods Commandements in this kinde: But this indeede is the best answer, That he breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whose euer hath faith and the feare of God dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely loose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Americ the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadad, and his Viceroy, The Soldan Samar; who being sodainly inuaded by Americ drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beate the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it beca direction from the holy Ghost, That hee that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, shall be the foule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the foule) to swear a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victorie ouer Amurath the Turke, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet he lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To bee Thornes in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and ensort to inhabit the Mountaines, and places of hardest access. And those of Iuda were not able to bee Masters of their owne Vallies, because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of yron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistins: as Azzab, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Jordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachabites: which inhabited the North parts of Basjan, afterward Tracountis.

Nor the *Ephraim*s possesse themselves of Beithshems: nor of Bethnabab, but they infort those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho; or Acon, Atidab, Ichab, Hebab, Aphike, and Rehob, nor in- force them to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kiron, and Nahol, but received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the *Ephraim*s: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Beithshem, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Moggado; yea Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend about foure hundred yeares, euen till Dauids time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeares, eigheteene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expresse in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fife and twentie yeares, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Author of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Masseus fixe and twentie: Aluanius cited by Masius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidus, fuentene: Caietan, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen and twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, fife and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeares from the deliuerance of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessarie that wee allow to Iosua only eigheteene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approved opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeares from the departure out of Egypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of error, such as haue inserted yeares betwene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius finds eight yeares, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapters vpon Iosua: Buring reckons it nine yeares; Bucholzer and Rehner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeares, there can be no void yeares found betwene Iosua and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him. Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battles of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter ver. 26. And Iosua wrote these wordes in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue beene meant by the covenant which Iosua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serue and obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caietan and Abulenfis: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum: remembred by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the worke of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these wordes of the 26. verse. And Iosua wrote these wordes, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when 50 people had answered Iosua: The Lord our God will we serue, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There liued at once with Iosua, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speede: And about the same time the fiftie Daughters of Danāus (as it is said) slew the fiftie Sonnes of Egyptus, all but Lyneus who succeeded Danāus, if the tale be true. There liued also with Iosua, Phœnix and Cadmus, and neare the end of Iosua life. Iupiter is said to haue rauished Europa the Daughter of Phœnix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begot on her Minos, Radamantibus, and Sarpēdon. But S. Augustine reports this rauishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Dencalion, and Dencalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpēdon was in person a yong or strong man at the same Troian warre. And lo doth Nestor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greekes, Thelcus and Perithous for men of antiquitie, and of ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

§. I.

The Proæme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Storie of the Judges ought to follow that of Iosua, after whome the Common-wealth of the Jewes was governed by Kings, of which fo many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall bee remembered when we come to the description of Samaria: But because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Storie past, with that which followeth hath bene acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better bee understood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength, were by the Jewes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnconquered: by whom he might correct and scourge them, when vngrateful for his many graces, they at sundrie times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idolls of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (saith S. AUGUSTINE) ideo maximè irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet seueritatem, ne æternam iussit inferni ultionem; The diuine goodnesse is especially therefore angrie in this world, that it may not be angrie in the world to come, and doth mercifully of temporall seueritie, that it may not iustly bring a populus eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I haue added a short Storie of the beginnings, and ends of diuers Kingdomes and Common-wealths: and to helpe my felie herein,

I haue

I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old paterternes.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistins, and the Lands of Qg and Sidon Kings of Busan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Prouinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus called Leuce Syrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petraea, that Region also which the Greekes call Mesopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuer, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram-Naharayn is expounded: also Padan Aram: that is, Ingum Syria, because the two Riuer goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edeffa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Prouinces, as Celestria which the Latines call Syria Canea, because it lay in that fruitful Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus and Anti-Lybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damascus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall seate of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobab: ouer which Adadazer commanded in Salemens time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syrpharines: and lastly Syria Palestina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolome maketh Judea also a part: and to that Prouince which Moses call the Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giuegh the name of Syria Iudea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BE Vt that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Desart betweene Idumæa and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountaines of Hermion; Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traceni or Tracemita, and Ptolome Hippata sit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebraea of the Hebrewes: who rooke name from Heber, the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arius Montanus not so well allowing of this deriuation, makes it a common name to all those of Zeobis Sonnes, which past ouer Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens or transmittens, of going or passing ouer. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebraei, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before th-m both. It had also the name of Judea from Iuda; and then afterwards intituled the holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christi was borne, and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure, namely into Edom, (othervise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the superior called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Euangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now

Now besides these Prouinces of Phanicia, and Palestine (both which the Riuer of Jordan boundeth; siuing that Phanicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Daniasus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermion, Gilead and Arnon, otherwife Tracanis, fell to the possession of halfe Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because anciently possit by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites, which Eastermost parts are againe diuided into Basan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowne to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general: and by the names of Tracomis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speake in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fall to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these be his wordes. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar vntill Asceab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrie North and South: then it followeth in the Text. And as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboim, even vnto Lasba: by which wordes Moses setteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterraen. But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be farre more large. For it is therein written: All the places whercon the sole of your feet shall treade shalbe yours: your coast shalbe from the wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the Riuer Perab, vnto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this Description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar and Asceab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perab be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petrea, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possit: nor at any time didd so much as inuade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the Riuer Perab, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of IOSEPH: Behold I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

And though it bee true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territory of the holy Land: yetas Vadianus well noteth, if Perab in the former place bee taken for Euphrates, then was it but per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid didd not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauilt, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow: but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselves also serued and obaiad. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were about the earth, was tied to those conditions both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent: which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect: who know that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to bee attended, than while we perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperitie of Israel. For therein it is written: Therefore shall ye so keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whether ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your daies in the Land which the Lord sware vnto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were about the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, saith he, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possesse great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it bee manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Majestie, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely voided, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith he, ostendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc politico regno; Hesheweth that his chief promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouertrew the reputation of the seuer Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viuendum terram quae in celis est; (that is) Only to that Land of the lining which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habet 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his citius regiones loca vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Iudeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole

Countrie of the Iewes is so narrow in compass that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countries, Places, Cities, and many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possit, but were only granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Ezay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where he hath these wordes. De quo dicimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina Regione petendam: quae totius Provinciae deterrima est; & saxosis montibus aperiatur. & penuriam patitur sitis: ut ut celestibus vitatur pluujs; & raritatem fontium cisternarum extructione solet: sed in Dei manibus ad quam dicitur festinauerunt Ieruerores tui; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that Region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Prouince, and ragged with craggie Mountains: and suffreth the penurie of thirst: so as it preserveth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building Cisternes, but this Hierusalem is in Gods handes; to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened, so farre S. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, hee thus expoundeth himselfe. Neque hoc dico in suggestationem terrae Iudeae, ut Hereticus Sycophtas mentitur: aut quo auctorem historiae veritatem: quae fundamentum est intelligentiae spiritualis sed ut decutiam supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagoga angustius latitudinis Ecclesiae praeserunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam; & non spiritum viuificant: offendunt terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judea (as the Hereticall Sycophtas belieue me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spirituall understanding, but to beare downe the pride of the Iewes: which enlarge the straits of the Synagoga smaller then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow only the killing letter; and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honie.

By this it may also be gathered, how fouler it be vnkely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the littell sense, that Euphrates or Perab, which is made the East bound; should be taken only in a spirituall sense) yet neuertheless that Hieromes opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perab were not to be understood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asser, Neptulim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part; and were seated in Phanicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asser for the first of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators: are diuersly exprest, so that to the vnkilfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the latter thinke fit.

S. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maide of Lea, were increased while they abode in Aegypt, to the number of 41 500. odd persons, all men aboute twenty years of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were multered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, 20 there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53 400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phanicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout; and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Propheeie, Asher pin-guis panis: concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And bee shall give pleasures for a King.

†. II.
of Zidon.

THe first Citie seated on the North border of the Territorie of Asher, was Zidon, which Iosua calleth the great Zidon: both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iosue deriues the name from the abundance of Fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidonia. But that it was farre more ancient Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witness, 40 the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosua's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asherites, or any of their Successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, euen vnto the coming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their own Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Eloy, Hieremie, Ezekiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wall of the Phanician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarbat: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is fourteene thousand paces, saith Segetius: but Padianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth VeisBarbarus in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two knowne Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer difficult to deuise any new scale to the Map and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memorie: The Storie which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre: which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Strab. l. 15. Tyre: because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became faire more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorabel, their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone; for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts and Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by nature and art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea; which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South side by the Port of Aegypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies besides that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephria, Cities of Baetia in Greece. Zach. 9. v. 1.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of Glasfe, which they vfed to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neare Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleare Glasses which they make at Murano: of which S. Hierome and Plinie, Zidon ignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrarj officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famosus Glasfe-maker, or a skillfull worker in Glasfe-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: which Idolls though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 3. 1. 10. and Judg. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11. 5. in the Storie of Solomons Idolatrie: where Astaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the Storie of Debab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said that he marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals and diuers Astaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Baalim and Astaroth, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elswhere: for euen the name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skillfull Hebrutian, is plurall: the singular being Astoreth: whence Jud. 2. 13. the Septuagint readeth idolatrias suas adscripsit. They worshipped the Astarites. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Astoreths, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diueritie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vfe to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Aug. gulfine quæst. 1. 6. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarite to be Isupher and Iano. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by some such name as Astarite. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarite: whom he makes to be borne of Tyris and Syria, and to haue beene the wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius, 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affirians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) the name of Adonis among the Tyrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarite, or Venus, they did bewaile her husband Adonis: as also the Grecians, did in their songs of Adonis. Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire.

Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifices of Isis: whose losse of her husband Osiris was as famous in the Aegyptian Idolatrie, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Isis et Osiride: that Osiris with the Aegyptians is called Ammus: which word may seeme seeme to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But how soeuer these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatrie: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jewes: who had bene taught by Moses, and the Prophets so many yeares, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke. Woe be to thee Chorazin, &c. for if the great workes which were done in thee, had bene done in Tyrrus, and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say vnto you it shall bee easier for Tyrrus, and Zidon, at the day of iudgement than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeare of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem, in the yeare 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Normans, who came with a flecte to visit the holy Land, and tooke Port at Toppa, it was againe recovered, the commandement thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeare 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while hee spent foure yeare in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeare 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

†. III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe Historie of Tyre in the same coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next Citie Southward from Zidon, betwene it and the Riuer called Naur, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a Citie very famous for the excellent Wine growing neare it: of which Sidonius.

Vinamibi non sunt Gazetia, Chba, Falerna, Quas Sareptano palmitis missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This Citie had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Possellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous Citie of Tyre, whose flects of ships commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Vtica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which VIRGIL. Vrbis antiqua fuit Tyris ite-40 nuere Coloni Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Calix. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos Achillis, which Citie the Schoolist of Apollonius placeth neare the Riuer Phyllis, in Bithynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation: because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end: the Latines, as it seemes, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, osfrum Sarraunum, by which name Iuuenall and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day: the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon: which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by assignie of name makes Thir the Sonne of Iaphet to bee the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie whose antiquitie is of ancient daies:)

daies:) yet, that Thir as the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perswade mee.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to bee the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this Citie elder than Salomon's Temple 240. yeares: Cædrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrrus the Wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the storie of their Kings.

For strength and for the commoditie of the harbour, and the better to receiue Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middelt of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it situat at the entrie of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and ESAY a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthie, and Magnificent was this Citie, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof. Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the world.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufecture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlor cloth: which, faith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing alongt the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idolls that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that hee had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their Citie: and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremonie: but this auailed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious, hee desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, hee as one whome no perill could feare, nor labour wearie, gathered together as many ships as he could; and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many waigtie Stones, from the old Citie of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often walht away with the strength of the Sea, and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Island: and hauing once approached their Walls, hee ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the sword that resisted, after which he caused 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongt the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood he performed (as some Authors asseme) vpon the illues of those illues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselves. This victorie of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembereth: and how Sanaballet reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Soldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius seated in Samaris: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Mamasse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might bee built on the Mountaines Garizim ouer Samaris: that the forces of the Jewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The Honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his sonne-in-law Mamasse, whom the Jewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballet, whom Gul. Tyrrus calleth Sanabul, died.

Long before this defolation of Tyre, by the crueltie of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beautie, riches, and power of that Citie. He besieged it on the Land-side, and and with three-score ships of Warre held the Port : to the end that neither any vituall nor any supply of men might enter it : but the Tyrrians with twelve fleet-scattered that flecte, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians : notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution and lay before it by his Lieutenants five yeares, but with ill successe. And this siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the storie among the Annals of the Tyrrians (which the said Menander converted into Greeke) adding that Elulais, whom Tyrinus calleth Heliassus, was then King of Tyre, having gouerned the same fixe and twentie yeares. Soone after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200. yeares before the victorie of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as he destroyed Jerusalem with 10 the Temple, came before this Citie : who indeed gaue to Alexander the example of that despairefull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it : though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawsey and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeares, the Tyrrians defended themselves: for so long did these Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Ezra had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeares siege or more, the Tyrrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number 20 of ships, abandoned their Citie, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained : and with their wiues, children, and portable riches sailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie his many labours and perills, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Egyptians : and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Armie. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaueth not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable 30 worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse reserved for his Seruaunts and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repaith them with many worldly gifts and temporall blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosors against Tyre, prophane Historians haue not been silent. For both Diodores, and Philostratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phenician 1 histories remember it.

After these two great Vassations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon : this Citie of Tyre repaired and recovered it selfe againe : and continued in great glorie about 300. yeares, euen to the coming of our Saniour Christ : and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neare 600. yeares : the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none 40 but to the Patriarke of Jerusalem only : who within his owne Diocesse had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans : namely Caipha, otherwile Porphiria, Acon or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Casarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthessa, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the yeare 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phœnicia and Palestina, subiected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whole tyrannie it suffered with the other Palestine Cities 488. yeares.

In the yeare 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Jerusalem; but in vaine : yet in the yeare 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Jerusalem, Vicegent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their flecte of Gallies, 50 it was againe recovered, and subiected to the Kings of Jerusalem, and so it remained 165. yeares.

Finally, in the yeare 1189. Saladine hauing first taken Jerusalem, removed his whole Armie, and fate downe before Tyre: drawing his flecte of ships and Gallies from from Alexandria into the port, this citie as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fierced, burnt, and brake the Saracens flecte, and falling out resolutely vpon his armie, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victorie with such furie, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeares after which victorie the bodie of that famous Fredericke Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies ouer a Riuier vnforadable 10 perilled by the weight of his armor therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeares before therein buried : but in the yeare 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turks.

†. IIII.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

20 The third Citie alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine, on the fourth bound of Asser was Acho, which was the ancient name there-after Hierame, though other good Authors affirme that it rooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomie. Pliny calleth it Ace: and otherwile the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos. Plin. lib. 5. ca. 19. in descriptione sancti.

But lastly, it was intitled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which citie also is it. 1. Mac. 11. an other of the Ptolomies infideliouly wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called him selfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphane: the same Alexander hauing married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolomie not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabaeus treacherously surprized 30 and slaine as it is 1. Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued as it is in the storie ensuing : and by like reason about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the warre against Demetrius one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolomie ioynded, ouerthrowne and treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian : to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolomie: who enioyed not the glory of his victorie and treason aboue three dayes, for God stricke him by death. 1. Mac. 11. 18.

For the beautie and strength of this Citie, this Alexander made it his regall seate, two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safetie and capacitie not inferiour to anie other in all that Tract. This Citie is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirtie miles : foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre Antoni- 40 nus maketh it two and thirtie Italian miles. In the middle of the Citie there was a Tower of great strength sometime the Temple of Bel-zebub : and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the topp whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharus in Egypt : to giue comfort in the night to those ships, which came heere and sought that part. It had in it a Bilhous seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian : but in the yeare 636. (a fallall yere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Harumarus the Saracen. In the yeare 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to 50 whom a third of the reuencue was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred foure score and leauen Saladine King of Egypt, and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeare of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninetie and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France it was repoulesed and redeliuored to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeare 1291. it was

Of the Castle of St. GEORGE.

Droch.

11in. 4.

Of the place & memorie of his death, See Chap. 9. §. 11.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of St. George seated, in which hee was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of S. Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours Royally have continued, should have borne his name, seeing the world had not that scarcitie of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a Fable, or Person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to have bene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the River Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these. *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, nunc longe à Beryto, memorant incolunt Christi Militem D. GEORGIUM, Regis filium ab inimicis Dracone asseruasse: eam, mactata bestia parenti restituisse. In cuius memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit adificata: In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint GEORGE, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and hauing killed the beast, deliuered the Virgin to her Parent. In memorie of which deede a Church was after built there. Thus saith Adrichomius. His Authors he citeth Codonius Roman. Patrie Natiuitatem, l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach 11in. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of S. George. If this authoritie suffice not, we may rather make the storie allegoricall, figuring the victorie of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

† VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong Citie of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome calleth Achzib, and Iosephus Ecdippus, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Assyriens. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue scarchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauielled as farre to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothe which by Ezekiel cap. 47. v. 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadarbezer, as it may bee gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. cap. and 8. verse, and cap. 10. v. 6. and it defended it selfe against the Assyrites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzib, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose Wall falling downe, slew seven and twentie thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Abab. Here Iunius finds that the Philistines incamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his Note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to have bene in Iuda. Of which Iof. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. hee reads, Fortiter, for, in aphek. Where others conuert it, Peruitions Syros in Aphek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandulum of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when hee besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified, in the year of Christ 1157. when he vndertooke the recouerie of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to traueile till it recouer the Sea, driueth fixe great Mills in that short passage, saith Borchard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the Citie of Achaph, or Axah, or after S. Hierome Acisap, a Citie of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iofua, at the waters of Merom.

† VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Further into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Iung de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter most Hills of Tyre, in the year 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the storie of the Warres for the recouerie of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobilitie. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Hamphrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Iherusalem, lieth buried: There were fixe Castles besides this within the Territorie of Affer: whereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort: The first neare the Sea vnder the Hills of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brother-hood and Fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens posselt the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Ptolomais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beaucie and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the River Nagar, neare the Citie Ramath: of which in this Tribe Iof. 19. 29. for which the Pulgar reads Honma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Aegypt, was by the Christians Armie raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong Citie of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gatula (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territorie of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua dipicere significat (saith Veshtenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twentie Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those prouisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabul or Cabul, containing a circuit of those twentie Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue bene without the compass of the holy Land: though bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1. Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for it was not lawful, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howlocuer, that after Hirani had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites; it appears 2 Chron. 8. 1. 4. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Reebob, whose Citee Roob, or Reebob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Gifcala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Jordan: Gifcala was made famous by John the Sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together four hundred Theeves, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judaea: by whose practise Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This John betraying in all hee could the Citee of Gifcala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the Citee, gaue opportunitie, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarams, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authoritie rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Maier, and * Cades: (or Cadesa) of the first was that Syro-phanician, whose Daughter Chirif deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neare the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabeus ouer-threw the Armie of Demetrius.

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Asher diuers others: as of which Iosephus in vita sua. a Of both which Iosephus in vita sua. b Of both which Iosephus in vita sua. c Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. d Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. e Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. f Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. g Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. h Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. i Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. j Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. k Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. l Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. m Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. n Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. o Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. p Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. q Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. r Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. s Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. t Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. u Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. v Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. w Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. x Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. y Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua. z Of Ezechiel, Iosephus in vita sua.

Of the Rivers and Mountaines of Asher.

The rivers to the north of Asher, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler joyneth Lycus, Ptolome, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neare Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus drawes neare vnto Zidon: finding his head withoutstanding, where Ptolome doth, betweene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called Fons horiorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Plinie; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chap. but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Asher: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesse Ptolome: and therefore Pline calleth it Palania, and Possellus Velana: which Riuer boundeth Phenicia on the North side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall Riuer of Asher, Arias Montanus calleth Gibatus, Christianus Schot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laislan (which Laislan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer Fons horiorum Libani: and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North side, Naar, and an other from the South-west Chabul: of the Citee adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be: There is also an other Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Author, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word Ghe which is added thereto to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the the Vulgar, the Geneua, and Arias Montanus turneit. There is also found in Affer the Riuer of Belus, remembered by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, *Smith * Plinie*: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Giasse, which sometime the Zidoniens practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedunim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Candusa, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Traualers into those parts witnesse. It is true that the Riuer of Chedunim taketh water from Chedunim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it finde the Sea at Ptolemae Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betwene Capphas and Sicaminum, witnesse Ziegler, Adrichome, and Schot.

Besides these Riuers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of liuing waters adioyning to Tyre: and * Maserephot, or after S. Hierome, Maserephot-mam, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Calefryia: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phenicia, and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land Eastward: foure hundred stadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Calefryia: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they beginne at Theiophoon; or Des facies, neare Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they beginne to part Traconitis and Basara, from the Desert Arabia, are called Herman: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phenicians Syrian, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountaine a-part; but a continuation of Hills: which running further Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Jeremie pro- ueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of all those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconitis: and Ptolome by Hispus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrarie to all other Cosmographers, but hee giueth no reason for his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops; because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with snow all the Sommer, the Hebrew word Libanon (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those trees yeild: because Libanus is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodisius affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kinde of honie dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Riuers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions are, Chyrorhus, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontis, Lycus, Adonis, Fons horiorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Affer, are those Hills about Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Neba, or the Mountaine of Abarim, in Ruben, Moses beheld Libanus three-score miles distant.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis,

THe next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asber, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the Sonne of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able to beare armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Soones 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twentie yeares of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adioyning as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asber, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adioyning to this Territorie of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the Citie of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountaines adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Babec; NIGER, Marbec; and Leonclausius, Beallebecca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldaean Paraphrast, the otherwife Beisbesmes, or after the Letines, Solis oppidum, or Damus Solis; The Citie of the Sunne: into which, faith Vipian, Seuerus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Gestellus nameth Dealmarch: 30 and of this name Stephanus also findeth a Citie in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the Region adioyning, of which Zysanus the Sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomee gaue it the addition of Zysani, and called it Abila Zysani. Volaterran names it Abila, of which hee notes that one Diogenes a famous Sophist was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphilius not Abiliens. After that this Citie of Abila or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith, Priscillianus became Bishop thereof: flaine afterward by our British Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered that in the Tribe of a Manasse, ioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is an other Citie of the same name, faying that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembered in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake it is written, Abel Beth-Macha (for belike it was the Towne of Macha, the Wife of Maier, the Sonne of Manasse), the Father of Gilead: in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This Citie Isa besieged: because Seba the sonne of Biehi, who rebelled against Dauid, fled thenceinto for succour: but a certaine wife woman of the Citie perswading the people to cast Seba his head ouer the wall, Isa retired his Armie. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground, and therefore no meruaile that many Townes (with some addition for distinction inction sake) were thus called: for euen of bewailing many places tooke name, as Bochim, Iudg. 2. 4. and so doubtlesse * Abel-Misraim, Gen. 50. 1. 1. and yet Iunius in his note vpon Nam. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim, was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground there (to wit, in the Land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Towne of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Tzinnab of the Ammonites, whither Iephth pursued them.

Of Hazor.

IN this Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous Citie of Tabin, in *Iosua*s time called Azar (so after the Chaldaean Paraphrast, Hazor) by Iosephus Azora, by Iunius * Chatzor: which Laestian names Hefron: the Regall Citie and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephtalim, towards Asber. In this Citie was that great Rendous, and assembly of those foure and twentie Kings against Iosua: who being all ouerthrowne, flaine; and scattered, this their powerfull Citie was by Iosua taken and burnt to dust. But in processe of time the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites, and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatrie, he preuailed against them, and held them in a miserable seruitude twentie yeares: till Dehora the Prophetesse ouerthrew Sisera, Tabins Lieutenant, and his Armie, neare the mountaine Tabor. This Citie Salomon restored at such time as he also reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with a Megido, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260. yeares after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalasar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, faith Abdrichomius, called Antiochia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is an other Citie of this name in the Territorie of Beniamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, b faith Hierome.

for Safina, of which 1. Chron. 4. 31. which also is called Chatzar-Safa, and Chatzar-Gadde: and lastly, Chatzar Shaleh, an other Citie of Simeon. Iul. 19. 3. a King. 1. 9. b Hieron. loc. Hebr. 1. 8. Out of Nebem: 11. 33. as it seemes.

Of Caesaria Philippi.

THere was also on the border, and within the Territorie of Nephtalim, that renowned Citie of Lais, or Lajsch, as Iunius writes it, or Leschen; which Citie the children of Dan (being straightned in their Territorie vnder Iuda) invaded and mastered: and gaue it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Gen. the fourteenth, at which place Abraham surprised Chedorlaomer and his confederates: and followed his victorie as farre as Sobab, formerly remembered in the diuision of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the ioynt-name of Leschen Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lais, the Geneue Lajsch, JOSEPHUS, Dana; BENIAMIN, Balinas; BREITENBACH, Belena: but this is true Iudg. 18. Inhabitants know it by the name of Belinas to this day: witness Neubrigenis, Tyrus, Volaterranus, Brocard the Monke, and Postellus: who also taketh this Citie to be the same, which in Matthew the 15. v. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Marke, speaking of the same storie, Dalmatantha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free Citie, of the alliance and confederacie of the Zidomians, or else subiect vnto the Kings thereof: for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges: And there was none to helpe, because Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no business with other men, for it was about thirtie English miles from the Mediterranean sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these Regions became subiect to the State of Rome, it had the name of Panæas, from a Fountaine adioyning fo called : and therefore Ptolomie calls it Cæsaria Panæa. Hegippus calls it Parnum, faith Weissenburg : but he had read it in a corrupt copie : for in Hegippus set out by Badins, it is written Pancum without an (R) : and at such time as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouverneur of Tracanis, sometime Basan, this Citie was by him amplified and fortified ; and both to giue memorie to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cæsar, he called it * Cæsaria Philippi : and so it became the Metropolis, and head Citie of Tracanis : and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned : by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memorie of his impeticie : so in S. Hieromes time the Citizens remembered their former Panæas, and so recalled it, with the T erritorie adioyning by the ancient name. Of this Citie was that Woman whom Christ healed of a bloudie issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith : who afterward as shee was a woman of great wealth and abilitie, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse grateful for the same, as Ensebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper : the one representing Christ, as neare as it could be moulded : the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towards him. These three mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestalls of the same Mettall, which these three placed by a Fountaine neare her owne house : both which (faith Ensebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time : which himselfe had seene, who lived in the Raigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeare after Christ 363. that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthie Monument to be cast downe and defaced : letting vp the like of his owne in the same place : which Image of his was with fire from heauen broken into fitters : the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminus, in his fifth booke and twentieth chapter.

This Citie built by the Danites was neare the ioyning together of those two Ri- uers which arise from the Springs of Tor and Dan, the two * apparent Fountaines of Jordan : in a soile exceeding fruitfull, and pleasant, for as it is written Iudg. 18. It is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this Citie, it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God : whereupon it was answered, Tu es PETRUS & super hanc Petram, &c. After this Citie received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate : and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians : vnder Fuleh the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians : and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the world subiect to the

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least : fo often remembered by the Euangelists, This Citie had the honour of *Christ*s pre- sence three yeares : who for that time was as a Citizen thereof, in which hee first Preached and taught the Doctrine of our saluation : according to that notable pro- phetic of Esay 9. The people that walked in darkness haue seene a great light : they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, euen where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee : in an excellent and rich soile : of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophecied in these these wordes. And thou Capernaum which art lifted up vnto heauen, shalt bee brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that Citie : for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in S. Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth : it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne : yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Brochard, Breidenbach, and Salimiac affirme, that it then consisted but of fixe poore Fishers mens houses.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in S. Matthens, Markes, and Luke, also remembered ; but I finde no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had : and so Plinie himselfe confesseth : for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it to the North by the mountaine Casius in Cositis : and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabie ; by which description it imbraceth Phanicia, a part of Celestria, all Pa- lestina, and Iudea.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he num- bereth foure of them to be situated towards Arabia : to wit, first these three Damascus, Opotus, Raphana, then Philadelphus (which was first called Ammana, faith Stephanus, or as I ghesse Amora rather because it was the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Pto. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis sometime Nysa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memorie of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Beisjan, for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Celestria, which was also called Antioch and Selenia : but that Gadara in Basan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on a high hill, neare the Riuer of Hieromaix. This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc : which boundeth Gad and Mansell ouer Jordan : but he mistaketh it : for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippus and Gerasa, whereas Iaboc entrencheth the same Sea betweene Ephron and Phannell. For the seventh he nameth * Hippus or Hippion, a Citie so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garrisoned by Herod, on the East side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of * Mansell ouer Jor- dan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region ouer Jordan called Pera. For the ninth Gelasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerasa : and Gerasa is found in Celestria by Iosephus, Hegelsippus and Stephanus : but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phanicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Canathis, and so doth Suetonius, and Stephanus, which Voketerran calls Ganale, but Hegelsippus rightly Camala, a Citie in the Region of Basan ouer Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, haue the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Salimiac, which make them to be these ; Cæsaria Philippi, and Ajor, before remembered, Cedes Neptalim, Seppher, Corazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Iotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors dis- agree herein and giue no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written : And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the middle of the coasts of Decapolis : so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North, by the Phanician Sea, betweene Zidon and Ptolomais on the West : by the Hills of Gilbo and Bethsan on the South : and by the Mountaines Tracomes, otherwise Herman, Sanir, and Galad, on the East : which is from East to West the whole breadth of the holy Land : and from the North to the South, neare the same distance which may be * Plinie hath Hippion Dius, for which Ptolemaeus reads Hippion, Ortelius takes them for two Cities.

* The Septuag. B Ut to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is leated neare the foote thereof the Citie of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adioyning taketh name : the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis : Iacobus Ziegler, Iuraca. Amara Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephtali per montem Libanum vsq; Trachones. The Countrey of Iuraca, liath he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachonitis, but herein following Siraso, who calls Trachonitis Ituraea, he mistakes the feast of this Region : and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Ituraea (which Heggeppius calls Perea, and G. Tyrinus, Baccar) the fame with Trachonitis, yet Trachonitis it selfe is farre more to the East than Hammath in Nephthaim : for Trachonitis lieth betwene Casaria & Blippi, and the Mountaines Trachones : which the Hebreues call Gilead : and this Hammath or Chammath is feated vnder Casaria, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Casaria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones.

This Citie Chamath or Hamath in Nephtalim ſeemes to haue been as ancient as the other in Ithur, both built by Amathus the eleuenth King of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hamath in Nephtalim were both neighbours to Damascus: of whole ſubigation Tobu reioyced, becauſe Haddadeſer whom the Damaſceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the ſtrength and proſperitie of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his territorie, bought his peace with many rich preſents, and with many ancient veſſells of golde, ſiluer and

But it seemeth that Dauid in such great successfe would not haue had peace with Tobiah if he had bin King of any place in Neptalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tybo: which Citie Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (*in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephthalim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being as it hath beene said possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a Citie well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

* The names of the chiefe Cities feared about this Sea, or lake, through which Iordan runneth, were Cyntrinum, Tiberias, Bethulda, Gadara, Tarichea, and they adde Cinnereth which in some times gaue name to the Lake and Countrey.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Cite of Isotapa: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surprised by Vespasian: who slaughtered many thousands of the Citizens: and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that *Sea and the Lake of Genesareth within Zabulon was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the Cite Tiberias, so named in honour of Tiberius Cesar, it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapollitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Sauour called Mathew, from the toll or custom-house, to be an Apostle, and neare vnto it raised the daughter of Tarnus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the raigne of Tiberius Cesar: in the most fruitfull part of Galilee, but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quam iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad septem dies impurus habetur, qui in talibus locis habitat: Where as by our law he should be seven daies held as vndeane who inhabited in such a place: by which wordes and by the whole place of Iosephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated not in Zabulon but in Nephtalim.

Neare vnto this Tiberias at Emaus there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias: More into the Land toward the South-west is Bethulia, seated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the storie of Isabernes and Indith, such as it is. Neare which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adioyning vnto it, Capharath fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes: and Iapha an exceeding strong place afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie slew 15000. of the Citizens: and carried away about 2000. prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Caritha of the Leuites, and Gabara, of which Iosephus in his owne life, then Iasie according to Adrichomius (of which Ios. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Iapha of which we spake but now out of Iosephus, Isadela of which Ios. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Isadela: vnder it Westward Legio, (afterward a Bilhops seate) and the Cite Belma in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Indith 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazareth is the Cite Saffar or Saffra, the birth-Cite of Zebedeus, Alphaus, James, and Iohn: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegeffippus and Hierome, was called Diocæsaria: the Cite of Iachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Marie, it was walled by Herod the Tetrarch: and by him, as Iosephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in an other place he saith Primum Gileacarum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris is greatly vexed Vespasian erreche wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seate of the neather Galilee, and so founded it with a strong wall, called it Antiochiorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Iosephus: and it is now but a Caltie called Zaphet.

To the South-west of this Sephoris or Diocæsaria was that blessed place of Nazareth, the Cite of Marie the Mother of Christ: in which hee himselfe was conceiued, it standeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Cite hee abode chiefly foure and twentie yeares, and was therefore called a Nazarene, as the Christians afterward were for many yeares. It was erected into an Archbishoprick in the following age. Neare vnto it are the Cities Baria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahalal of which Ios. 19. 15. and Jud. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalal: and Ios. 21. 35. where it is a Cite of the Leuites, neare the Sea: adioyning to the Riuer of Chifon is Sarid, noted in Iosua for the vttermoost of Zabulon.

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and Iohn: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared: in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine, the Emperesse Helena built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chifon, which rising out of Tabor runneth with one streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with an other streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedunim or Cadunim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolemie calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguish them: and see Chorfeus by Cæsaria Palaestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neare Magdalum: which Torrent they call Dorham, from the name of the Cite, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthai which Iosua reckneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

See Lactantius Morte in Ortibus Ios. 19. 14.

S. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

The next adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and South-west, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their multers at Mount Sinai 54400. able and warlike men, who leaning their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holie Land, 64300.

The first Cite of this Tribe neare the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more, a Cite wherein the Jewes (by the practise of a certaine mutinous vpstart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouvernour of both Galilees. This Cite was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian: who entred it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Jewes in a sea fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all forts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the Riuer of blood running through euery street, hee referred the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cesion, or Cishion, of the Leuites, and then Safar, remembered in the first of Kings, 4. 2. v. 17. then Abes or Ebes, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Kamoth. 1. Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a Cite of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboa ete beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Cite of Iezrael, betwene which and Kamoth are the Cities of Bethpheser, or Bethpheser, according to Ziegler, and Enadada, or Ben-chadda: neare which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those Aphes or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betwene which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistines incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of blood, for herein also, saith hee, the Syrians with two and thirtie Reguli assisting Benhadad encountered Achal: and were overthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victorie: which was, Tell, BENHADAD, Let not him that girdeth his harness boast himselfe, as he that putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeare following in the fields, as they say, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian vterly broken and discomforted by Achub: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which overthrow the seruants and Counsaillors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines they should ouer-come them.

Vnder Aphec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon, in the plaines of Galilee, called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casaleth, of which 1. Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seefima or Shashtima, the West border of Isachar, of which 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Cattle of Pilgrimes: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-houise and Magaline of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Tolouse.

From the Cattle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthestmost shore beginneth Mount Carmell, not farre from the Riuer Chifon: where Elijah assembled all the Prophets, and Priests of Baal, and praised King Achub and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal, were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done the Priests of Baal praised, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies not at leisure, or perchance a-sleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adioyning.

At the foote of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Persina and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Sea coast towards Tiberias by the banks of Chifon, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Aphram, and the Cattles of Mesra, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the Riuer Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widows only sonne.

Then Seen or Shion named Iesua 19. betwene the two Hills of Hermon, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchauntresse that vnder-tooke to raise vp the body of Samuel at the intligation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anabarith and Rabbith named Ios. 1. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Daberath as it is named, Ios. 21. 28. or Debratha, as it is named, 1. Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which stretcheth it selfe ouer Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela situate, neare the Caues of those two Theeues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herodes time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Iesael: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterranean Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon, and the Riuer Chifon on the North. In these * plaines Geleon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they take, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therja, and others.

The next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Ioseph, the eleuenth sonne of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the Daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made vp the number of the twelue Patriarchs.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 322000. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entred of their issues 52700 bearing armes. The Territorie which fell to this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterranean Sea on the West, Iesael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asiathe lesse, and pierst into the South, to the vttermost of Calesyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen it by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people, constrained the Iewes to fight against their owne Nation and kindred, by whose handes when they had obtained victorie, they themselves set on the Iewes which serued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the vtmost towards the South of Calesyria: and Strabo ioynes it to Galilee. It is seated betwene Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acris abietis, saith Ziegler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Iesael neare Jordan: after that Jordan streighteneth it selfe againe into a Riuer: leauing the Sea or Lake Genesareth. Notwithstanding, Montanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterranean Sea, neare Endor, contrarie to Stella, Lieftan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane an enimie, or Beth-san, the house of an enimie.

Ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the bodie of Saul, and his sonnes, slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian Religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocesse, numbered by Tyrtius, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nacareth. The later traualiers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillars and other peeces of excellent marble, which witness the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to bee the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since a towne of that name, neare neare Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture Gen. 13. 18. doe not confirme, where the Pulgar readeth transiit in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others reade, venit in columnis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Salem not to be a proper name, but an adiective) yet the place Iohn 3. 13. where it is said, that Iohn was Baptizing in Enon neare Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which Iohn speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalem, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1. Sam. 9. 4. This word Iunius maketh to be the Plurall of Shubal: of which we reade, 1. Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had beene as much as a Woman of this Salem, neare Enon, it hath no probability.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem; they finde Bezeck the Citie of Admibezeck, Iosephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel, and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieue Iabesh Gilead, against Naash the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neare Bezeck is the Citie of Bethbera or rather Beth-barai of which Iudg. 7. 24. in the storie of Gedeon: and then Ephra or Ephra wherein Gedeon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal: which he pulled downe and defaced: and neare it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 700. brothers: a Heathenish crueltie, practised by the Turke to this day; and not farre hence, betwene the Village of Asphon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Lathurius overthroweth Alexander King of the Jewes: and slaughtred as Iosephus numbreth them 3000. but according to Timagenes 50700. after which victorie, as Ptolomeus saith by the Villages of the Jewes; hee slew all their women: and caused the young children to bee sod in great caldrons, that the rest of the Jewes might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and like them with the greater terrour.

Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Leuites, and Abel-Mehola, which Iunius, Iudg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim; it was the habitation of Heli saw the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1. Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baanai by Salomon; to whose charge also Takenai belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Iosias, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie given to the Leuites.

In the body of this Territorie of Manasse, but somewhat nearer Jordan, than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Iosua slew: which the Kings of Israel vied for their Regall seate: till such time as *Samar*ia was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Ashta to enquire of her sonnes health: who knowing her, though shee were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neare *Samar*ia, of which name there are both in Egypt, and Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Towne, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelech was wounded by a waigite stone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who despairing of his recoverie, commanded his Page to slay him out-right, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this Citie in Ephraim neare Sichem or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territorie adjoining is called Acrabathena (one of the Ten Tetrarchies or Governments in Judea) for which Hierome 1. Macc. 5. reades Arabathena: but in the Greeke it is Acrabathine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Governour thereof. Iosephus remembreth it often, as in his second Booke of the Jewes Warres, c. 11. 25. 28. and elsewhere.

The difference betwene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a Citie with some lesser Territorie adjoining, and a Tetrarch is the same with Præses in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof so called. Plinius nameth Epiphanes

Epiphanes

teene Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Teland to this day, Leuisler, Pisler, Connath, and Mounslar.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, and Geshremmon of the Leuites: but Iunius out of Ios. 2. 1. 2. 5. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Ibleham Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Iezrael a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end shee might possesse his Vineyard adjoining to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Ioram also was cast vnburiad into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel King. 2. cap. 2. murdered Naboth.

Toward the Sea from Iezrael is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahasiah King of Juda fled from Iehu, when hee had slaine Ioram, hee was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound hee died at Mageddo adjoining. The 2. King. 9. 27. Scripture calls this Citie Citie of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadrammon, neare vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a Warre vnadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affrica against the King thereof: by the commandement of God: whome Iosias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour Citie to Adadrammon was Mageddo, often remembred in the Scriptures: whose King was slaine among the rest by Iosias: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The River vvhich passeth by the Towne, may perhaps bee the same vvhich Ptolomeus calleth Chorfeus: and not that of vvhich wee haue spoken in Babylon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holy Land delineate no such River. Moore only sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelue Tribes: but the River vvhich passeth by Mageddo hee vnderstandeth to bee but a branch, falling thenceinto. Laisian and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place: agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name then the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, euen to Sebaste or *Samar*ia; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Iosephus calls Cæsaria Palestina a Citie of Phœnicia, yea Laurentius Corinius extendeth Phœnicia as farre as Gæza: feeling also Ptolomeus sets downe Chorfeus for the partition of Phœnicia and Iudea: is this River running East and West parallel with *Samar*ia: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomeus in his fourth Table of Asia calleth Chorfeus. The 40 later trauellers of the holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

t. II.

Of Cæsaria Palestina, and some other Townes.

FROM Mageddo toward the West, and neare the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Cæsaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Siraton: the same which Plinius calls Apollonia: though Ptolomeus sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, betwene this Citie and Ioppe, to which Vespasian gaue the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceede all the workes in that part of the world: For besides the edifices, which hee reared within the Walls, of cut and polihnt marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence hee might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing blowing from the Sea the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their cables and Anchors. This worke hee performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that kinde hath not bene found in any Kingdome, nor in any age: which because the Materialls were fetcht from farre, and the waight of the stones was such as it exceedeth beliefe, I haue added Iosephus owne vvordes of this worke: which are these. *Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magna clasti recipienda sufficere: & in viginti vltimorum profundum, prae grandia sacra demisit: quorum plerique, pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine nouem pedali: fuerunt quaedam etiam maiora, minoralia; To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Iosephus) hee compass in a way wherein a great fleet might well ride: and let downe great stones twentie fadome deepe: whereof some were fiftie foote long, eighteen foote broad, and nine foote thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawlie of two hundred foote long, to breake the waues: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with diuers flately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent hee called Drusus, after the name of Drusus, the sonne in law of Cesar: in whose honour hee intituled the Citie it selfe, Cæsaria of Palaestine: all which he performed in twelue yeares time. It was the first of the Easterne Cities that receiued a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishoppicke, commanding twentie others vnder it, saith Tyrius.*

Y. 14. c. 12. bell. Ioseph.

St. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorius, and Gelasius to haue bene Bishops thereof: In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by S. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was herein two yeares prisoner, vnder the President Felix, vnto the time and gouernment of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cesar. Here vpon Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a God by his flatterers, hee was stricken with an Angel vnto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphth Dor, as some reade Ios. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Iesua. But Iunius for in Naphth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor: and so the Pulgar, in regionibus Dor: although 1. Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth 30 omnis Nephth Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iesua call it Nephth Dor, and in the other of the Kings Nepht Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ios. 12. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may seeme to bee Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie: and the fourth in account of those twelue Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Maccab. 1. 1. placeth it betwene the Hill Carmel and the mouth of the Riuer Chorfeus: for so some name the Riuer Chorfeus, of vvich vve haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the sonne of Demetrius: where he was by the same Antiochus besieged vvith 120000. foot-men and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villaine that receiued 200. talents for the ran-some of Jonathan Maccabaeus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, vsurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Cæsaria.

Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Galgal, was in Beniamin: but this Galgal, they say, it was whole King was slaine by Iosua.

Neare vnto this Citie the Prophet Iona was three daies preferred in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Amipatris and Cæsaris, standeth Nicarbata, whereof the Ter-ritorie taketh name: which Cestius the Romane wasted with fire and sword, because the Jewes which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neare vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: where- in he hidde an hundreth Prophets, and fed them, after which hee himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of propheticall.

CHAP. VIII. Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§ I.

The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the inuention of Letter's ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five Tribes, of Asser, Nephthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, posselt the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a Briefe of those Kinges which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange: seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, & in so many changes of Estates and Conquests of Heathen Princes, haue bene torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: 40 but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casus, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Elcuthernus, that falls into the Sea at the land of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chorfeus, which seemes to bee that which the Jewes call the Torrent or Riuer of Maggeddo. Plinie extends it farther and comprehends Ioppe within it: Cornelius and Budans, Ioppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Bydæus) quæ nunc Palaestina Syria dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith hee) which now is called Palaestina of Syria.

Pto. 4. Tab. 1. p.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 12.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudaea, and Palaestina, euen vnto Pelusiū, the first Port of Aegypt. On the contrarie Diodorus Siculus, foldeth it vp in Cæsaryia, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceived in his owne art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Lands) lands) to wit, Aradus, Orthofia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Casaria Palestina: and by reason of the many ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subject to that familie were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iosua time. For till then it is probable that there was but one king of all that region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandal Wars. But in procelle of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Pro-10 phet it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iosua yet gouerned Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sonnes Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possit the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Sonne) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europa taught the Græcians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surpris'd Tyre, had rollen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of Iupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also suppoed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia: and findes Cadmus 20 his succellour: whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the succellours of Dido held that name alwaies in reuerence, making it a part of their owne as Astrubaal, Hannibaal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verſes:

*Hic Regina grauem gemmis auroq. poposcit
Implicitq. moro pateram: quam BELVS & omnes
A BELO soliti.*

The Queene anon commands the waightie bowle (Waightie with pretious stones and masse gold)
To flow with wine. This BEVS vsd of old,
And all of BEVS Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemeth to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancellor to those Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Libya, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the sonne of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Egypt: *Agenor*s succellour liuing at once with Iosua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territorie of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in steede of the building of Tyre, and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For bee it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Egypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian: yet is it very likely that either he came to saue his owne Territorie: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iosua conducted ouer Jordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrewes from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Desarts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Amalites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt hauing such Vessells, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistines which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which 10 Agenor was fild to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iosua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iosua called the strong Citie, Ascho afterward Ptolomais, Atzib and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those daies.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mightie, especially by Sea, it appeareth, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeares against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed vnresistable) spent more time in the recouerie of Tyre, than 20 in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Callisthenes deriue it ab arbore daſylorum, and the Greekes from the word Phonoi, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnneceſſarie.

The Ethiopians affirme that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and 30 euill Policies, which they afterward profest and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Libyans: to wit, from the South and Superior Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuitie. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Africans: whence Lucan.

*Phœnices primi (sæua si creditor) ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*

Lucan. l. 5. 31

Phœnicians first (if same may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our wordes to graue.

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno: when he in a kinde of reproch was called a stranger and a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix quid tum? nam CADMVS & ipse Phœnix: cui debet Græcia docta libros.

Athen. 1. Dignus

If a Phœnician borne I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Judea, contra Apocam.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient : and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports : but affirme constantly, that the great Zamoxis flourished among them : when Atlas liued in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Oebus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druids are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sonnes hither to bee by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Mose, the same hath no probability at all, for hee liued at such time as learning and arts flourished most, both in Egypt, and Assyria, and he himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall flood: either by Seth, or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdom and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other: as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Bookes: after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently vsed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heralrie: and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutcheons, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations. Iura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natura all Lawes are common and general.

§. II. Of the Kings of Tyre.

BVt whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zoro, Sachoniathe, Mnæstas, and others of that Nation, being now here found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iosua, to whome succeeded Phanix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what Kings succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phæto gouerned Phœnicia.

C. 17. v. 3.

In Hieremies time and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King a-part: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of seuerall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith he inuaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded as some Writers affirme, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiected by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembered, Hieremie prophecied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus: remembered by D. Sculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependance vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Græcians. But diuers Kings, of whome there is no memorie, came betwene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 120. yeares and somewhat more betwene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed esteemed the more vnworthie of restitution, because (saith Curtius) hee rather submitted himselfe by the infligation of his Subiects (who forewore their vtter ruine by resistance) than that hee had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenaus out of Theopompus reporteth, that hee was a man of ill liuing: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women dancers, and fingers: whom he to this end chiefly inuited, and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and liuely among them, hee might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were neare him with an Armie too waigbrie for his strength, and finding that hee was to hope for little grace; because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians: hee determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie; and died.

After Alexander was posselt of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, Hee gaue the Kingdome to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might bee inferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolonimus, Iustine Abdolonimus, and Plutarch Alynonus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting herbs, and rootes, for his relief: and sustenance: though otherwise a wife man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twentie Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes, nor in other particulars.

Abibulus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abermalus: the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibulus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibulus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eusepius) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth Psal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Iosephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieramennus, sometime Hieramas, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entered into a league with David, and sent him Cedars with Masons, and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Ierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was hee that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of money, but also heioyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram there is not only mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2 & 3. in Theophilus his 34. booke, in Tatians his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mightie and magnificent, he despised the 20. townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against

For Pygmalion couetous of Sithens riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be depouled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his Mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Familie of the Barca in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hannibal. Seruus interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Iedidia, a surname of Salomon.

Elielus succceeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. yeares: the same that ouerthrew the flecte of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which hee continued his siege before it on the Land side five yeares, but in vaine.

After Elielus, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this Prince died, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who ferrouned and attempted Tyre 13 yeares together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeares a tributarie, perchanee, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death it was gouerned by diuers Judges, succceeding each other: First, by Enibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerasus, who held it among them some 7. yeares, and odde Moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeare: after him Mervalus sent from Babylon 4. yeares: after him Irom sent thence also, 20. yeares. Of Bozirus his conceit that the Edumeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phenicia the knowledge of the true God.

God.

IF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozirus that hath written a Tract at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder Heaven, haue proceeded from his ordinance who only is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the said Bozirus, enforcing herence, that the prosperitie and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumeans, descended from Esaui, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be beleueed that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glorie, was in any sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooue which the Scriptures giue of *Hiram*s good affection when Salomon built the Temple) he brings many coniecturall arguments: whereof the strongest is their pettiegre and descent: it being likely in his opinion that the posteritie of Esaui receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeuours to shew, partly by weake reasons, painfully strained from some affinitie of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight: partly by authoritie. For Strabo, Herodotus, Plinie, and others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phenicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumeans: as Elah and Esiangaber, or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalek the Nephew of Esaui, whose chiefe Citie was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posteritie did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israhel. Hercunto hee addes that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartus, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thules and Pherecydes being Phenicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophie from the Idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumeans, was an Enueusitie, wherein as may appeare by Eliphaz the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin.
Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the discourse of Bozirus, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by an other; deferues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what Religion Esaui brought vp his children it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posteritie were Idolaters, is directly proued in the five and twentieth Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetual enemies to the House of Israhel, saue only when Dauid and some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of *Dauid*s vnfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betweene Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Israhel slew all the Males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israhel, that the Edumites were so illintreated. It seemeth that the pietie and ancient wisdome of Eliphaz the Temanite,

Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumaeans punished, for being such as David in his owne daies fought them. Although indeede the Citie of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumaea, but an other of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the Countrie of Job: and to Sueh the Citie of Bildad the Sabite, as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, doe plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Job is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisdom, all the people of the East; not their inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphaz, the sonne of Esfau had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those daies to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a sonne called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seuenth Chapter of the booke of Judges the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleue that such a people were descended from one of Esfau his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue bene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Familie of a Tribe had bene so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But wee no where finde that Edom had to doe with Amalec: or assisted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being sonne to Abraham by Ceturah, doublelesse was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniorie of the Red Sea-coast, which Bozsius imagines the Edumaeans to haue held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esfongaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith that Israel did compass all the border of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs haue knowne it: because he had sojourned long in that Countrie: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Aegypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable fouer, are needlesse: in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozsius himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Israel. 29. because they were euer Idolaters, and of the cursed seede of Canaan, not Cofens to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wise Sonne, we cannot inferre that he was of Dauids Religion. The Turke hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is that the Sidonians then worshipped Astaroth; and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatrie.

Whereas Hiram aided Salomon in building the Temple, hee did it for his owne endes, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oile, and the offer of twentie Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram, in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon. Hee allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestured: being otherwise apt to yeeld silkes: as the Andarine silkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oile, which hee wanted, hee gaue that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiser: who hating got the gold first, gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that hee had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessarie policie which informed Tyrrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Moab, Ammen, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and recarrie their Wares on Cammells, to their fleets on the Red Sea: and backe againe to Tyrrus: so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries, through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Israellites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might haue greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent workes, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore hee willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betwene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozsius frames negatively vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I thinke, no man knowes. It seemes to me that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, hee would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but fine examples. Euery language Nation hath some whose wilddome excelleth the vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whome being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatrie, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, that Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I thinke, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue bene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians, who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were likewise.

This their Idolatrie from Salomons time onwards is acknowledged by Bozsius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue bene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptorie, that he lieth men of contrarie opinion, impious politicians, as if it were impietie to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honestie, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse this doctrine of Bozsius, would better haue agreed with Julian the Apollata, than with Cyril. For if the Affyrians, Greekes, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most when they drew neare vnto the true Religion: what may bee said of the foule Idolatrie which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euery new victorie? How few great battailes did the Romanes winne, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honour to one of their old Gods? yea, what one Nation saue only that of the Jewes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertaine in their Citie? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jewes, they reiected, vbraiding the Jewes with him, as if he were vnworthie of the Romane Majestie: shall we hereupon inforce the leud and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatrie had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozsius, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeede. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour: who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others: or vainly fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimera's of Diuinitie, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidells, that are not transported with the the like intemperate ignorance. Great pittie it is that such madde Dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of EPHRAIM, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was EPHRAIM.

§ I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of EPHRAIM.

Plat. 59. 78. 108
Fol. 25.

AVING now past ouer Phenicia, we come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: some time taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts (Iosua excepted) then entered the Holy Land of their children, growne to bee able men 32500. who late 30 downe on the West side of Jordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had was Samaria: the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel: built by Amri or Homri King thereof: and seated on the top of the Mountaine Somron, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This Citie is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater than those of Ierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly marble pillars, with other heuen and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sonnes of Hyracanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the sonne of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Heliſam, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptiſt. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Gracian Monkes.

Nearer Samaria towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to bee worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In light of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napolaſa: It was destroyed by Sinnon and Lewi, in reuenge of the rauishment of their Sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec cued cued with the foile. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time calt it downe.

Vnder Sichem towards the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon on the Mountaine Iudea. 12. 15. Ameter, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Neare to this Citie Iudas Macchabeus ouerthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Samaron formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir of which Iof. 10. And Saron whole King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned Act. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Casaria Palestina extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, faith Adrichome. Though indeede the name Saron is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitful plaine Region; for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Casaria and Ioppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esey interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdia, reade Saron for Asaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neare Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopolis, or the Citie of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudea, the fifth in dignitie (or the third after Plinie) where Saint Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) cured Aeneas. Niger callsa that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe Saron. This Ioppe was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Rauens and spoilers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, viurpers of other Princes Kingdomes: who with no other respect led than to amplifie their owne glorie, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most saluage and barbarous Nations.

In Diopolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memorie Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to bee built ouer his Tombe, these be Tyrius his wordes: Relicta a dextris locis maritimis Antipatriade, & Ioppe, per late patentem planitiem Eleutheriam pervenſimus, Liddam qua est Diopolis, ubi & egregij Martyris GEORGII vsque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, eius Ecclesiam quam ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, AVGVSTVS IVSTINIANVS multo studio & deuotione prompta edificari preceperat, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatriade, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diopolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. GEORGE is at this day shewed: whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romans, High and Mightie IVSTINIAN had commanded to bee built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrius, by whose testimonie we may coniecture, that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vpror of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than hee is commonly thought: for his wordes of the Temple of GENIVS, How long shall this Sepulcher stand: occasioned the vpror of the people against him: as fearing least hee would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports: who though hee say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet he addeth that his ashes with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, least if their Reliques had bene gathered vp, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part I rather thinke that it was not this Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather an other, whom Tyrius, aboue cited, witnesseth to haue bene buried at Lidda or Diopolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitruvius. S. Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Near to Lidda or Diopolis, standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward ward Rama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama: one they set in the Tribe of Iuda near Thecus in the way of Hebron: an other in Nephthim, not farre from Sepher: a third in Zabulon, which, they say, adioyneth to Sepheris: a fourth, which they make the same with Silo: and a fifth which is this Rama in the Hills of Ephraim, called Sama. c. 15. v. 5

From hence to the North along the coast are Helon, or Aidon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the Warre of the Iewes. Also Bal'alisa (for which Iunius 2. Reg. 4. 42. reades planities Shalifite) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim: but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 9. where we reade of the Land of Shalifis, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of government, the second in dignitie, of which the Countrey about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-jara, or according to the Hebrew Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Presidencies of Iuda, which they call Thamnithica: a goodly Citie and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim: on the North of the Hill called Gaa: which Citie and Territorie Israhel gaue vnto their Leader Iofua: who also amplified it with buildings, near which hee was buried. His Sepulcher remained in S. Hieromes time, and ouer it the Sunne ingrauen, in memorie of that greatest of wonder, which God wrought in Iofua's time.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarfa or Alafa: where Iudas Maccabaeus with 3000. Iewes ouerthrow the Armie of Tigianor, Lieutenant of Syria: neare to Gafar or Gezer which Iofua tooke, and hung their King: a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Egypt: the people all slaine, and the Citie razed: Salomon rebuilt it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Iesteti, of which Iof. 16. 3. otherwise Pelethi, whence Dauid had part of his Pratorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Bensai. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yeares, till the Philistims got it.

To this they ioyne the Citie of Machmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabaeus inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naith where Saul prophesied: and neare it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Ieroboam: after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Then Eshijam of the Leuites, of which Iofua 2. 1. 22. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokneham, of which 1. Chron. 6. 28. As for Abidoms Basalor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reads it the Plaine of Chazor: and findeth in the Tribe of Iuda: as Iof. 15. we reade of two Chazors in that Tribe: one neare Kedesh 40 v. 23. and the other the same as Chetzeron v. 25. toward Jordan.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello: whose Citizens, they say, ioynd with the Sichimites in making the Bastard Abimelech King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus Mello, reades incola munitionis, and for Salomo edificabat Millo, he reades edificabat munitionem, and so the Septuagint reades in arxibus in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but an other in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by 50 Iofua: and Ianoach or Ianoah spoiled by Teglabalsasser: Pekab then gouerning Israhel: with diuers others, but of no great fame.

The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Jordan: seuerall parts whereof are the Hill of

Samaria

Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahaz Iudg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon or Salmon Iud. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tijphor or Tijophim Iud. 9. 5. where Rama-Tijophim stood, which was the Citie of Samuel.

The great plentie of fruitfull Vines vpon the sides of these Mountaines, was the occasion that Israhel in the Spirit of propheticke Genes. 49. 22. compared Ioseph two branches, Ephraim & Manasse, to the branches of a fruitfull vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her a Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegorie also Ezekiel c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) persecutes: as also in his Lamentation for Iuda, hee followeth the other Allegorie of Iacob Gen. 49. 9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both sides of Jordan, they finde the Castle called Dak: which they make to bee the same with Dagon, of which Ioseph. 1. Bell. Iud. c. 2. in which Castle as it is 1. Maccab. 16. Ptolomie most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabaeus his Father-in-Law.

Among the Riuer of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaa, remembered in the second of Samuel. c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reade Hiddai ex vna vallum Gaba: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus reade Hiddai of the Riuer of Gaa. Also in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was fed by the Rauens: and after that the Riuer was dried vpon hee traualled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where hee was relieved by the poore Widdow of Zarepta, whose dead Sonne hee reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oile: whereby hee sustained her life.

¶ II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from IEROBOM to ACHAB.

30  F the first Kings of Israhel, I omit in this place to speake: and referue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuision from Iuda and Beniamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings was Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephraimite of Zereda, who being a man of strength and courage was by Salomon made ouer-see of the buildings of the Millo or Munition in Hierusalem, for as much as he belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in those workes. During which time hee went from Hierusalem, hee comming the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that he was by God destinated to be King of Israhel: and to command ten of the twelue Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, hee fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Esechias calleth Osechores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessour of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumean, when hee was carried yong into Egypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Iaab: which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes: vning both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Iuda: that him selfe might the easier spoile it, as he did: for in the fifth yeare of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the spoiles which Dauid tooke from Adad of Seba, with the presents of Tobin, King of 50 Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israhelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hierusa- lem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) hee erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, faith S. Ambrose, or rather of Atrons Calfe in Horeb) further hee made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Pallace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Iudaean Prophet, whome Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Iud: His hand there after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatrie, and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posteritie.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twentie yeares: whome Nadab his sonne succceded: who in the second year of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Bascha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeares.

Bascha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made Warre with Afa King of Iuda: hee seated himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama againt Iuda, to restraine their excursions. Hereupon Afa entertained Benhadad of Damascus againt him, who inuaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Afa carried away the Materials, with which Bascha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater hee was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twentie yeares and died.

To Bascha succceded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Pallace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambri after hee had reigned two yeares: and in him the prophetic of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambri succceded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seuen daies; But Ambris in reuenge of the Kings Murther, set vpon Zambri, or Zimri: and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

Ambris or Humri succceded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Thersa to Samaris: which he bought of Shomer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria: the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue: seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Afa King of Iuda, to assaile Bascha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelue yeares, fixe in Thersa, and fixe in Samaris, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

CHAB or Ahab succceded Omri, who not only vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but hee married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaris. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias preuailed in the trial of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets: and afterward flieth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samaris: and taken by Achab was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaeas) reprooueth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to bee stoned. Then ioyning with

Iosaphat

Iosaphat in the warre for the recouerie of Ramoth, hee was slaine as Michaeas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioas: besides seuentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succceded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: hee bruised himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beelzebub the God of Acharon. Elisha the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and milking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie souldiers to bring Elisha vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercie at Elisha hands, and hee spared him, and went with him to the king: auowing it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second year of his raigne.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succceded: He allured Iosaphat king of Iuda, and the king of Edom to assist him againt the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselves and their horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flowe. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flieth to Kirharsis: and being besieged, according to some Expollitors, burnt his sonne on the walles as a Sacrifice, wherewith the three kings moued with compassion returned and left Moab, waisting and spoyling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom: whom they suppose in this irruption to haue bene taken prisoner, by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the walls, threatening vnlesse the siege were disolued, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom besought those of Iuda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safetie of his sonne: which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, and that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of Edoms sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assaillants might discern it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forooke the partie of the other kings: for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the leproulie. The answer of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that hee doth send to heale a man from his leproulie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell againt him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him: promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by walshing himselfe seuen times in Iordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirittuall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoeuer the Aramites consulted in his secretest counsell, sent a troupe of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha stroke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaris, Ioram then asking leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harne them: but caused them to be fed and sent backe to their owne Prince in safetie.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits did againe attempt Samaris: and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armor to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege, an act of great admiration as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azed obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Ioram entring vpon his frontire tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which warre he receiued diuers wounds: and returned to Israel to be cured. But whilest hee lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was annoyed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Prophets

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not only the race of his foregoers, but also their Religion; for which hee receiued a promise from God, That his seede should occupie the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatrie of Ieroboam, for which hee was plagued with grievous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreies to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres.

Pag. 86.

Iothaz or Iehozabaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whome Azael and his 10 sonne Benhadad often invaded: and in the end subiected: leaving him onely 50 horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot: and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Iothaz reigned 17. yeeres.

2. King. 13.

After Iothaz Joas his sonne gouerned Israel: who when hee repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay in his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commaunded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisha couered the kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or sixe times: and then hee 20 should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as hee gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Joas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battells, and recovered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his father Iothaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazias king of Juda, who prouoked him to make the war: whereupon hee entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Joas reigned fixteene yeeres and died; in whole time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

2. King. 14.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Joas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors: but hee recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and fortie yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who reigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great crueltie to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with tenne thousand talents of silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fiftie shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twentie yeeres.

2. King. 16. 19.

Pekahiah or Phacia, or after Zonaras Phaceia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, hee was slaine by Phacac or Pekab the Commander of his armie, who 40 reigned in his place. In this Pekab time Phulassar or Tiglat-Phylassar invaded the kingdome of Israel, and wanne Sion, Ahel-Bethmaaca, Ianoach, Kedesb, Hafor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawn in by Achas king of Judaea against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adadei. For Achas being wasted by Pekab of Israel and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, and therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchie of Syria and Damascus: and then of Israel: and this inueting of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Judaea. Pekab reigned twentie yeeres.

2. King. 15. 29.

Then Hoshea or Osee, who slew Pekab, became the vassall of Salmanassar: but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicus king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, hee cast him into prison, besieged *Samar*ia, and maltred it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Ninive in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Esterne Regions, and there disperfed them: and

and re-planted *Samar*ia with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthae (inhabiting about Cutha a Riuer in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Canaanites bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharuim (a people of Sephar in Medes 37. Sopetania vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Sennacherib vaunteth) also with those of Assa: which were of the ancient Assians who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neare vnto Gaza: whom the Caphorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Hanai: willing to returne to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or Ituraa, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damascus: which so often assailed them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judaea, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thinne Garrisons, which sodne decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could bedriuen thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekia King of Juda: and the ninth of Hoshea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of DAN, SIMEON, IUDAH, RUBEN, GAD, and the other halfe of MANASSE.

§ 1.

Of DAN, where of Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

Now following the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which familie there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their sonnes 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that Coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Iosua imbarked himselfe when hee fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Machabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Machabaeus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garifond in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens about them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which fought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant vtterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeare of Christ 1250. Lodowick the French King gaue it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: and from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scanius during his office of Aduleship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Iosua speaks of it indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Iudas Machabaeus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seate, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time that such a place there was.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anibedon, saith Volaterran. And so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anibedon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor au-thoritie for his opinion; for Ptolomee lets Anibedon farre to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteen miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after him: nor any of the Israellites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did diuers others not much inferior in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Roboam

Roboam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazia destroyed it againe. It was also laid wast by Azazel King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Cattle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the fame that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre calls Gylgin, I much doubt: the er-rour growing by taking Gath for Anibedon.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes or the house of the Sonne. In the fields adioyning to this Citie (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemes presuming to looke therein, there were slaine of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000. by the ordinace of God. After which slaughter and the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great * Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name; one in * Nephtulim: an other in Iuda: and another in Iachar.
Hierome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast the strong Citie of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Casaria Palastina. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Danites and Iudaans. It worshipped Beelzebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Abimelech King of Israell sent to enquire of his health: whose Messengers Eliab meeting by the way caused them to returne, with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This Citie is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whose Iosua failed to destroy, though he once posselt their Citie. Herin stood a sumptuous Temple dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe; after the Arke of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple; and in the second fall it was vtterly broken and defaced. Neare it was that famous Iudas Machabaeus slaine by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Ionathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire:
neare which also he ouerthrew Apolloniue.

Gabinus the Roman reuilt it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianitie flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tjorah, or Sora, and Elbaal, and betwene them Casira Danu near Hieron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seme by the wordes Iud. 18. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Iudah, as the other also were bordering Townes betwene Dan and Iuda.

After these within the bounds of Iuda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cenebeus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Iewes, and neare which himselfe was by the Machabees ouer-throwne.

Then Modin the Natiue Citie of the Machabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulcher the seuen Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heigh as they served for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeares after their first setting vp, as Brochard and Breidenbach witnesseth.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariatharim, that is, the Citie of the woods:
seated in the border of Iuda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twenty yeares in the house of Aminadab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem: Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the sonne of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was slaine betwene the Temple and the Altar: also Prius whom Iachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Ieremie. Many other places which

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Iosua c. 19. from the Verse 41. where also it is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lechem, and inhabited it: which Citie after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Galilee, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this Citie see more in Nephtalim. It hath two Riuer or Torrents: the Northern-most riseth out of the Mountains of Iuda: and passing by Modin, fallerh into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentifull of Vines which haue no feedes or stones: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, tast, and fauour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the Riuer, inhabited Dallia whom Samson loured.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes vp the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second Sonne of Iacob by Lea, they were increased of that Familie while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Desart, were entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing armes, who were in part mixed with Iuda, and in part seuered, inhabiting a small Territorie on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa, of which the first Citie adioyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Regni or petty Kings thereof were called Ascalonite: of which Volaterran out of Xenobius, in the Historie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sonnes of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being imploied by Asiamus King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a young Woman of that Countrey, built this Citie and called it after his owne name: the same hath Nicolas in his Historie, faith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third Booke remembreth a Lake neare Ascalon, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Demeter the Goddess of the Syrians: hauing the face of a Woman and the bodie of a Fish: who, as I haue said before, in the storie of Venus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fed and releued by Doves. And therefore was the Doue worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tribulus the Poet:

Alba Palästina sancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palästina.

It was one of the chiefe and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men (faith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus who wrote the storie of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two years old and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian

Vol. vi. supra.

Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England while he made Warre in the holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum SALADINVS diruisset, RICHARDVS ANGLORVM Rex instaurauit, faith Abricobinus.

In Dauid's time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul, and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalene. Gabinus restored it as hee did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewees call Hazza, the Syrians Azotus: (as they say) the sonne of Heraclides. Other prophane writers affirm, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Metela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian: because belike he rebuilt it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, he receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desart.

Alexander Ianneus King of the Iewes surpris'd it: and slew 500. Senators in the Temple of Apollo which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not let vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Machabees, and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was fort by Simon: of which he made so great account as he purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left Iehnn his Sonne and Successeur to be Governour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the Riuer of Bezor, standeth Maïoma the Port of Gaza: to which the priuledge of a Citie was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance after the name of the Emperours Sonne. But Julian the Apostate being after fauouring the Gazarians made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

On the other side of Bezor, standeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Ianneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the fauourite of Augustus.

Then Raphia where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name * of the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint conuerted it by Rhinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that wateereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocoura; and Iosephus, Rhinocorura: Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lots, betweene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Bezor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth betwene Kadeb and Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neare to the Wilderness of Beer-Shebah, it appears Genes. 20. 31. and therefore no meruaile that as elsewhere Beer-Shebah, so sometime Gerar, became the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; S. Hierome faith that afterward it was called Regio Iudæaria; The healthy Countrey: so that it was no meruaile that Abraham and Isaac liued much in these parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Steeleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, 1. Sam. 30. but but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Befor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In S. Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Daema: Iofua 15. 49. it is called Vrbs Sanna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbabi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othomel, encouraged by Calebs promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Iofua and the Hoast of Israell were at the surprize, it appears Iof. 10. 39. This Citie Iof. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simcon and Juda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simcon, but of lesse fame, as Hayn, of which Iof. 19. 7. which also Iof. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Juda and Simcon (for which Iunius thinks of Esilham is named 1. Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Iofua these two are distinguished) also Tholad so named 1. Chron. 4. 29. for which Iofua 19. 4. wee haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Sufa so named Iofua 19. 5. for which Iofua 15. wee haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Sufa Equitatus.

In the same places of Iofua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to bee the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites. But that Chorma cannot bee in Simcon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Desart.

The same places also name Beerseba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimelec: neare vnto which Hagar wandered with her Sonne Ismael. It was also called the Citie of Isaac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simcon which are named in the places of Iofua, and of the Chronicles, aboue noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekias King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being freighted in their owne Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Iof. 15. 36. is called Geder and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they seated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chieft: vnto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Riueres are Befor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Assef.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

F Juda the fourth Sonne of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sonnes there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Judea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simcon included. And many Cities named in these Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the children of Juda: who had a kind of Soueraignty ouer them: as Socoth, Cariatharim, Lachis, Beerseba, Tsiglag, Beerseba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it bee meant by that ground giuen to this Tribe only) were vncredible if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chieft of them: beginning with Arad, or Forma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Maab: and tooke from them some spoiles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keni, the Kinmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acraabim is placed, the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in that place: from which name of Acraabim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie called Acraabithena was denominated: of which wee haue spoken in Mansses. On the South side also of Judea they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Ceder, Alfina, Iethnam, and Afor or Chasfor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desart and Forreit adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Karkah, and Alemon, or Haismon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumaea towards the North, we finde the Cities of Dunna, Shemah, Anam, the other Afor, or Chasfor, Behaloth, and the two Socotes: of all which see Iof. 15. also Cariath by Iofua c. 15. v. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traidor was called Is-carith, as it were a man of Cariath. Then Ietham the abode of Sampson which Rehobam redified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iathir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called tethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neare vnto this Citie was that remarkable battaile fought betwene Asa King of Juda, and Zera King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the victorie as farre as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not farre from Iethar, standeth Sarmuth, whose King was slaine by Iofua, and the Citie ouerturned. Next vnto it is Marefa the native Citie of the Prophet Michas: Betwene it and Odolla, Judas Muchabau ouerthrew Gorgias: and sent thence ten thousand Dragmas of silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odolla or Hadullam it selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Iofua, and the King thereof slaine. Ionathas Muchabau beautified it greatly. Then Cela or Kella afterward Echela, where Dauid sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward afterward he delivered from the assaults of the Philistims: neare which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained and was scene by S. Hierome.

Neare it is Hebron sometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariat Harbe: the reason of this name they give as if it signified the Citie of foure: because the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plain by the places Iofua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not signifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whose sonne as it seemes Anak was: and Achim, Shephai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled Ief 15.) were the sonnes of this Anak, Nam. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament: and it seemes that this Anak enriched by the spoiles which him selfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and so got this name: and leaving the custome to his posteritie left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan: built seven years before Tison or Tanis in Aegypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given: to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the self to the Lewites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembred often by S. Hierome. Tl en Eglon whose King Dabir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeanites, were by Iofua vterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emais, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Presidencies of Iudea. In sight of this Citie Iudas Macchabeus (after he had formerly bene both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301. it was ouerturned by an earth-quake, faith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Casaria of Palestine.

From Emais toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nabama, Bethadagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederuth * Iof 15. v. 36 & 41. 30 Then Azecha to which Iofua followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a Citie of great strength in the Valley of * Terebith or Turpentine: as the Vulgar readeth 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seemes) they feat it neare vnto Soco, and vnto Lebus of the Lewites. It reuolted from the subiection of the Iewes while Ioram the sonne of Iofaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next vnto this standeth Maceda which Iofua vterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emais towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Lehem, and Bethfor: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Iuda: It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house of the Rocks, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam: and afterward by Iudas Macchabeus. Lysias for it, and 40 Antiochus Eupator by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Syrian exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within fixe miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata: which name, they say, it had of Caleb wife, when as it is so called by Moses: before Caleb was famous in those parts Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abessan or Ibozan, Iudge of Israel, after Iephthab, famous for the thirtie Sonnes and thirtie Daughters, begotten by him. Eliemelech was also a Bethleemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moad during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Ishai, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to be the native Citie of our Saviour Iesus Christ: and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a Citie of the same name: and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethleem Iuda.

From Bethleem some foure or five mile standeth Thecua: the Citie of Amos the Prophet:

Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethlura and Hierusalem: on whose Hills adioyning the glorious gilt shields of Antiochus thined like lamps of fire in the cies of the Iewes. The Citie of * Bezek was also neare vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-bezek commanded; who had during his raigne tortured 70. Kings, by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the fame end befell himselfe by the sonnes of Iuda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe by vntill we come to the magnificent Cattle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desert of Ieruel, between it and Tekoa, is that clitus floridus, where in the time of Iehosaphat, the Iewes stood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammosites, and Edomites, mauling one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Iuda: neare which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange deliuerance.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are these: Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tsohar which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called because Lor in his prair for it vrge that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tsohar, which signifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balezina. Then Engaddi or Hen-gaddi, first Ajalonshamar: neare vnto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the belt that the world had called Opobalsamum: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queene of Aegypt sent for out of Iudea, and Herod who either feared or loued Anthony her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neare Heliopolis in Aegypt. This Citie was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Iudea: and one of the Presidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land; and among them Iserael; not that 30 which was the Citie of Naboth, of which already: but an other of the same name, the Citie of Abinoan, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Amnon, whom Abisalom slew: also as some thinke the Citie of Amasai, Abisaloms Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this seemeth to be an error grounded upon the nearnesse of the wordes, Israel and Iserael: and because the 2. Sam. 17. 25. Amasies father is called a Israelite, who first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Israelite: indeede the Hebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amasies Father is not said to be of the Citie Iserael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Israelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills or Mountaines, as those of Engaddi vpon the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Iuda, which beginne to rise by Emais, and end neare Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simcon. Of others which stand single there is that of Hebron: at the foote whereof was that Oake of Mambré where the three Angells appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome calleth a Fir tree; and faith that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achille, on the South side of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Cattle, erected by Ionathas Macchabeus; and called Masfada; garnished it with seven and twentie high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men: being as it seemeth a place vnaffectable, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Alphalitis, this Countie 50 had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their vnnatural finnes.

S. III.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from SEHON King of HEBSON.

N the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Deserts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before wee speake of these or the rest that inhabited the east side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came many mightie Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jewes: by Esau or Edom the Idumians: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites, and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly posselt by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them defended) these issues and alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumias: which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael 30 rooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea: stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petrea, and a part of Arabias the Desert, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Haulah.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian: and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Eschen, or Cheshon.

Ammon late downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and posselt the Tract from Rabba afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountaines of Gilead, and without them as farre forth as Arroer, though in Moses time hee had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundrie parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse: whereof that part which Moab had, was first posselt by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakned and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzammims: or Zuris, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betwene Abarim and Jordan, and driven them thence from Hebron ouer Arnon, and this happened not long before before Moses arrival vpon that border, when Labeb gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Labeb, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electiue, as the Edumians anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Eschen was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arriued there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amorites: and therefore did Iephthah the Iudge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alleged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Iephthah) had three hundred yeares time to recover them, and did not: whence hee inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And least any should maruaile why the Ammonites in Iephthah his time should make claime to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21. vers. 26. rather accounts them to haue beene the ancient possession of the Moabites: then of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehon was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephthahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraigntie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the Mountaines of Galaad, or Gilead, and as farre South as Arroer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought to recover it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Sehon at Iabac, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betwene it and Iaboc: Sehon and Og two Kings of the Ammonites hauing dispianted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Num. v. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboc, euen vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon; within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboc which at length the Gadites posselt, as in the thirteenth chapter of Joshua vers. 25. it appeares.

†. II.

Of the memorabile places of the Reubenites.

The chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of variant, readeth Ieshon. The Vulgar or Hierome fol- lowed the Septuagint those two verses 36. and 37. of 21. 10/ being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint red Kedsion for Kedemoth, which Kedsion by writing slip into Ieshon.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparteth name to the Desert ad- ioyning: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Joshua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beser & ville eius, reads Adri- 50 Beser in solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adri- chomius makes a Towne called Misor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neare the Dead Sea (for the Countrie betwene being Mountainous hath fewe Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lasa or Leshab of which Genes. 10. vers. 19. the Greekes call it Callirhoe: neare which which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweete water, all which foone after their riling, beeing ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contractions of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenies: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's or Kings. The other town is Macherus the next between Lafa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Cattle, standing upon a mountaine every way vnaccessible: It was first fortified by Alexander Innnapus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus, in the warre with Aristobulus, saith Iosephus. It was thither (saith Iosephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein hee was slaine: his armie foone after being vtterly ouerthrowne by Aretas king of Arabia, and himselfe after this murder neuer prospering. Not farre from Macherus was Bozor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and neere it Limis vpon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Limia the mother of Tiberius Cesar.

To the north of Limis is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the bodie of Zimri and Cesbi with his speare bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midst of their sinne: and from hence Iosua sent the Discouersers to view Ierico 20 staying here vntill hee went ouer Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Atrichomius dreames of, reading Ios. 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius valem cedrorum: expounding it not for anie particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, as it is Psal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country hereabout by Moses called The Plains of Moab, where he expounded the Booke of Deuteronomy to the people, a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same booke precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran: where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chaffersoth, and Dizahab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolemy in Palestina, the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathai in Arabia Petrea, where was * Mexahab, of which Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medana and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan: and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban Deuteron. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Limis, of which euen now we spake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Calestrea, it had Thophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Calestria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be ouer against or neere vnto Suph, for which the Pulgar hath there Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. 40 it tranflateth the word Suph in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, vseth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or suphah: which doubtlesse was about these Plains of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Country being full of freedes, was therefore thus called: as also the red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the Storie of Gedeon is called Beth-bara. Iosephus saies it was where after the Citie Abila stood, neere Jordan, in a place set with palme trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plains of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim and Bel-sathaim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with

Atrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

* Toward the East of these plaines of Moab, they place the Citie Nebro, Bad-Meon, Sibma, and Hebron the chiefe Citie of Schon, and Elhabel, and Kiriathaim the feat of the Giantes Enim. Of the two first of these Moses seemes to give a note that the names were to be changed: because they talked of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nebro (in stead of which Iunius Es. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Bad-meon is the habitation of Bad. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebro in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgab, Moses before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which Iunius doth not take Phasgab or Pisgab, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatibala in some places; as Num. 2. 1. 2. where he noteth that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Isa. 13. 20. called Ashtoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iosua there is also named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Bad the Idoll was called Bad-Peor, which they say was the same as Priapus: the chiefe place of whose worship seemes to haue beene 20 Zamoth-Babal, of which also Isa. 13. in the Citie of Reuben: for which Num. 22. 41. they read the high places of Bad (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

30 There were besides these diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul 1. Sam. 25. v. 21. gaue his Daughter Michol from David: but Iunius thinks this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10. vers. 29. where it is named among the Citie of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. v. 19. we may say that Mathana and Nabathel were in these confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the rest of the Citie of Moab. Hieron. 48

Madian also is found in these parts, the chiefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: 40 but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Isai inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plaines of Moab: at such time as Israel beganne to accompanie their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the South-faier were to be flaine: and their Regall Citie with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Isai was Prince, or Priest, forgate not the God of Abraham their Ancestor, but reliued and assisted the Israelites in their painefull traualles, through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chiefe Citie of Edom, there is 50 that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Sela, which is as much as rupes or petra. 1. Reg. 14. 7. It was also called Isaheel, as appears by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (saith Iosephus) by Reem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites slaine as before is said: after whom it was called Reem: Now they say it is called Crae and Mozera.

Iunius refers the name of the Citie Ieraphan 1. Maech 37. of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Iulias (according to Iosephus sometimes Bataramphus) the same Iosephus placeth it in the Region of Peras, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peras, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more than: Regio ulterior, the Countrey beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Peras take more paines than needs. Fourteen Villages this Iulias had belonging unto it according to Iosephus. He makes it to have bene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias in the honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Familie: by which adoption shee was called Iulia. An other Iulias, he saith, was built by Philip, the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which hee saith is the same as 10 Bethsaida.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neare to Iulias in Peras (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they finde Yezezobra, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-zabab, which is as much as domus hispani. Of a noble Woman of this Citie, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romanes, came with many others into Iherusalem, and was there besieged, Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable Historie, how for hunger shee ate her own child, with other Tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Iof. 13. is placed with Beth-baran), in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon it is plaine by the storie of Gedeon that it is neare unto Jordan: where it is said, that as hee was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebab and Salmunab, he requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeon's returne were by him tortured, as seemes vnder a threlshing Carre or Tribulum, betwene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as they were preft and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which sort also Dauid vied some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in hast, either for Men or Cattle, Moses Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: As also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Ramesis in Aegypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vied after for tie yeares in the Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth or Tabernacles was instituted.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named. Iof. 21. 38. Ramath in Gilehad, Machanajim, Chebron, and Iabzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites; of which Iabzer, as Chebron or Hebron was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence Nim. 21. 1. his Countrey is called the Land of Iabzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In later times (as it may be gathered by the prophetic of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites, to which place of Esay, also, Hieremias in alike prophetic alludes: It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Machabaeus: as it is 1. Macc. 5. 8. where Iunius out of Iosephus reads Iabzer, though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gazer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16. 3. & 2. Sam. 10. 10.) was farre from these Countreys of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Aegypt won it from the Canaanites, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Chebron it may be meruailed that in the place of Iosua, and 1. Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to have bene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such Cruples, finding Cabon 1. Macc. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilehad, taken by Iudas Machabaeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cabon had bene the Chebron of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it; but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betwene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites: for so also it seemeth that that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanajim, which word signifieth a double Arnie, we read Genesis 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of an other Host or companie, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we read of a multitude of the Host of heauen, which appeared to the sheep-sheards, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so vnto the Godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the battaile was fought in the North parts of England, is called Heauen-field. In this Citie of Machanajim Dauid abode during the rebellion of Abalom: and the same for the strength thereof Amer chose for the fate of Ishobab, during the warre betwene Dauid and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilehad, we read often in the Scripture, for the recouering of which King Achab lost his life. Iunius thinks that La-math-Mispha, of which Iosua 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilehad. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilehad, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of bones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument: so also that it was called Misphab, which signifieth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witness to their covenant) it is plaine by the place Gen. 31. 49. that in these parts there was not only a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mispha, it appears Iof. 11. 3. where we read of the Chunites vnder Herman, in the Countrey of Mispha: the Towne of Mispha, as it seemes both by this place and in the eight verse following, being not in the Hill Countrey, but in the valley. But seeing that Iephia the Iudge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his bretheren had driuen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mispha, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his bretheren, it may seeme that they do not well which place this Towne of Mispha rather in Gad, then in Manasse. By Iudas Machabaeus this Towne of Mispha (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was vtterly spoiled and burnt, and all the males of it 30 slaine: for it was then posselt of the Ammonites.

Betwene Succoth (of which we haue spoken) and the River Iaboe was that Peniel or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei: A place where the face of God was seene: so called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishnesse of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gedeon, was the cause that in his returne he ouer-threw their Tower, and slew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To the place of the Gadites, they adde Regelim, the Citie of that great and faithful subiect Bozzilai, as it seemes, not farre from Mahanaim, where he sustained King Dauid, during Abaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Townes of Gadid, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gadid being in Hebrew no more then Gadidita, is 30 ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Towne, but still of a River. Alimis Adrichomius frames of is Aquis, 1. Macc. 5. 26. so that the name should rather be Alima, but Iunius out of Iosephus reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and understanding Malle to be put for Malle, and to be as much as Alimio (as we haue shewed touching the Malle of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malle to be Mispha Moabitum, of which 1. Sam. 22. 3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Machath, which Moses noteth to be as farre as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1. Macc. 5. 10. (which Iunius takes to be Rhema, of which Nim. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territorie of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith and 30 Abelvinearum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Iephia's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other in the East border, both farre removed from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was nearer, and not farre from from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath as Dent. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolemy findes in Celestria. Thierome and Calistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer posselt by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seate of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzammims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Rapham, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his ancestors: who hauing bene first beaten by the Affyrians, and their affliants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had bene) were afterward the easer conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumaeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Gyants were defended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had disposselt Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betweene them recovered the best part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countries, which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeares since that these Zamzammims or Raphams were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Ammonites, they recovered againe much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Deserts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Perusia and Affria (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Moses had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites, take opportunity to looke back againe into those plains: and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites forsooke the worship of the liuing God, and became flourish and licentious: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased, or displeased God: and according to the wisdome and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauid's time, and the inhabitants slaine with great fureitie, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Pris was shot to death, hauing bene by direction from Dauid appointed to bee employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein Dauid so displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, cuen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the waigheite and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as some expound it, was vsed to be set on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those which Ptolemy calleth the hills of Heppus, a Citie of Celestria: and Strabo * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus vnto the Deserts of Moab: and receiue diuers names as commonly mountaines do, which neighbour and bound diuers Countries: For from the South part, as farre Northward as Aferoth the chiefe Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead, from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Herman, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all those Hills also were called which part Iudea and Idumaea: and lastly they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Thieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These mountaines are very fruitfull, and full full of good pastures, and haue many trees which yeeld Balsamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Riuer of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the Riuer Iaboc: Others doe also fancie an other Riuer, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Basan.

His Tribe of Gad, posselt halfe the Countrey of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabathaea, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og Ammonites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Orhemiel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioynd with the Moabites against the Hebreues, and so continued long. Iephth Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe.

Afterward we finde that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nabab: who besieging Iabes Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eies. The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame vpon Israel) because those Gileadites vsing to carrie a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eies, should by loosing their right, be verily disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nabab, as it may seeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Iosaphus thinks that this Nabab was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Iabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanan succeeded Nabab: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aides receiued from the Ammonites subiect to Adadazer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maachab, and from Israh, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouerturned: their chiefe Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken, the Crowne which waighd a talent of gold was set on Dauid's head, all such as were prisoners Dauid executed with strange fureitie, for with sawes and harrowes, he tare them in peeces, and cast the rest into lime-kills.

Iosaphat gouerning Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Ostias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Joatham inforced to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundredth talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeares.

The fifth King of the Ammonites of whose name we read was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.

of the other halfe of MANASSE.

The rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basán, with the Land of Hus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of **Batanea*, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the halfe Tribe of Manasse over Jordan, of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptoleme setteth farther off, and to the North-east, as a skirt of Arabia the Desart: and all these other Provinces before named with Peraz, and Ituraea, he nameth but as part of Celestria; as farre South as Rabba, or Philadelpia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, fauing the Land neare the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground then the Countie of Kent.

Basán, or after the Septuagint Basamitis, stretcheth it selfe from the Riuer of Iaboc to the \ Machati* and Gessuri: and from the Mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile, by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattle. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howe O yee Oakes of Basán) and by reason hereof<sup>20</sup> they bred fo many Swine, as b. 2000. in one Heard were carried head-long into the Sea, by the violence spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarenes. It had in it three score Cities walled and defended: all which after Og and his sonnes were slaine, Iair descended of Manasse conquered, and called the Countie after his owne name, Anoth Iair, or the Cities of Iair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these; Pella sometimes \ Butis*, otherwise Berehiet; by Selenus King of Syria it is said to have bene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken and in part demolished by Alexander Iannus King of the Jewes: because it refused to obey the Jewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Dixer. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by Judas Macchabeus: where he set on fire the Temple of their Idolls: together with all those that fled thierinto for Sanctuary; and neare it they place the Castle of Carnaim, of which 2. Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong Citie of Ephron neare Jordan: which refusing to yeeld passage to Judas Macchabeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken, and burnt with great slaughter.

Iaboc Gilead, or Iabesur, was an other of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being besieged by Nabab King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is elsewhere mentioned. In memorie whereof these Citizens recovered, imbalanced, and<sup>40</sup> buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung defigntfully over the walls of Bethsan or Scythopolis. Gadara or Gadara is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill neare the Riuer Hieromace, which Riuer Ortelius seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. At the foote of the Hill there spring forth also hot bathes, as at Macherus. Alexander Iannus after ten Moneths siege wane it, and subuerbed it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinus made it one of the five Courts of Iustice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Hierico, and Sephora in Galilee the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyrannie of Herode surnamed Agrippa, accused him to Julius Caesar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not preuaile, and that Herode was highly fauoured of Caesar, fearing the terrible reuenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei: in which Iosephus ant. 5. 13. saith, Ieziba n. 19. p. 15. ant. 13. Of Misja in Gilead the Citie of Ieziba, see in the Tribe of Gad.

was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Iud. 12. 7. Sepulchrum est in Cinitate (i.e. in una Cinitatum Gilead) imagine Gilead to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1. Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Caphor for Cheshon; the same Arichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gileaditarum Cinitas, so of one Citie Heshon or Cheshon, which they call Essebon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Caphor in Manasses, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Cashon, of which we haue admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Cammell) which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Iosephus in his fourth booke of the Jewish warre: where he describes the place by nature to be almost inuincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his owne person, entering it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of fise thousand, thus perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romanes: so that none escaped, saue only two women that hid themselves.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Plinie gives the name to the hills that compasse the plains in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to haue bene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was waied by the Jewes in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were innaged against their borderers.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrebi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basán chiefly abode, when Moses and Israhel invaded him: and neare vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he lost the bataille and his life. It stood in S. Hieromes time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these Townes neare Jordan, in this valley stood Gerasa or Gergessa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fift Sonne of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we read Mat. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Diuels out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the heard of Hogs: in which storie for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarenes: not as if these were all one (for Gergessa or Gerasa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this storie. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius Lieutenant to Vespasian and 1000. of the ablest yong men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hierusalem: and by him vtterly razed. Neare vnto Gerasa is the Village of Magedan, or after the Syriack Mageda, or after the Græcke Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Sauour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appears that this coast lay betweene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countie of Decapolis. Brocard makes both these places to be one: and findes it to be Phale, the fountain of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Iezibaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desart of Iezibaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five Barley loaves and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Ilasis, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberius, called Julia, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Josephus makes this Julia, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazin, of which Christ in Matthew 3. We be come into thee Corazin.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Aseroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphai: and therefore the Countrey adjoining called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Aseroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Isop. 13. 21. it is called Aseroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Aseroth, which was the image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Aseroth in Deut. signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim, to have beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes * radiant. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words Isop. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Raphaiorum: but if the Carnaim (or Karnajim) were these Raphai, the word would not have beene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphai in Aseroth of the Carnaim, but either the Raphai in Aseroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for periphrasis: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Aseroth Adrichomius out of Brocard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Judith, and there that of this Citie vnderstand David in his 120. Psalm: and here the Sepulcher of Job is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad instead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Judith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalm doe rather proue that Cedar was not here about, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scemita Cedareni, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolores, much more than any vnder the Climate of the land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulcher of Job it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) faine many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed that many (if not all) the historically circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrey seek to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrey was, and build vnto him a Citie by conjecture.

Of Job himselfe whether he were the same Jobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esau, and King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Iyranus, Olesler, and Bellarmine are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with Albanus, Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius Emislenus, Apollinaris, Eusebius & other, cited by S. Hieron in his 126. Epist. take him for the same.

The Land of Huts or Hus wherein Job dwelt is from the Greeke Oûs, which the Septuagint vse for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Job. 1. 1. sometime Asutis, as Hierome 2. 5. 20. This Land is plac'd by Junius between Palestina and Caesaryia, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmiyyene in the Countrey called by Ptolomie Trachonitis or Batthana: the bounds which Countries are confounded by Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasse. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Husites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneam turbam, because their bounds were not only ioyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the wordes of Ieremie, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same prophetic, of which he speaketh in the nine and twentieth Chapter, must needs be expounded: as Iunius reads them distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, & quae habitas in terra Hutz, O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filia Edom quae habitas in terra Hus: Daughter of Edom which dwelleth in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned haue thought that Job was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumaea. For it is very probable that Esau when he first parted from Jacob did not cate himselfe in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Iordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Siderians call Shiron, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir, and from this his habitation did Esau encounter Jacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esau his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posteritie of Esau inhabited Seir to the South of Iudea: for it is like that the Ammorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence-forward feared themselves to the South of Iudea, bordering the Desert Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Deserts as farre as Iler where Aram died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue beene lost: and partly because in Job 6. 32. 2. Elibu the fourth of Jobs friends, which seems to be of Jobs owne Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Buz, the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Hieremie 2. 5. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture that in the place of Job 32. Elibu the Buzite is said to be of the Familie of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Jobs friends (which must needs be this Elibu) was of the posteritie of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly) and in as much as he readeth not de familia Aram, or Ram, but de familia Syria: like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Jobs friends (of whom by this note of Elibu his being of the Syrian Familie) or of the familie of Nachor it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuaginta addition, that this Elibu was of the Land of Hus, or Asutis, it is implied that they thought only Elibu to haue beene of Jobs owne Countrey.

Franciscus Brocard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the journey from Acon Eastward, findeth Snetbis, and Therman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neare to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchit; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchits were inhabitants of Arabia the Desert, descended from Shuch the sonne of Abraham and Actura: of whom Gen. 52. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Sacae. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Desert: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue beene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Esau. And so also Nahamsh whence Joseph the third of Jobs friends (which in this place of Job 6. 2. 1. 1. are mentioned) is by the same learned expofitor thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Eſau that gave denomination to the places where they were ſeated) or elle to be the ſame Nabamah, which Joſe. 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I denie not but that neare to the Land of Hus, in Baſan, as it ſeemes, in the Tribe of Manaſſes, there is a Region which at leaſt in latter times was called Suitis, or of ſome like name. For this is euiden by the Hiſtorie of Willielmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diuerſly) of exceeding great ſtrength and vſe for the retaining of the whole Countrey: which in the time of Baldwin the ſecond King of Ieruſalem was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Chriſtians: hauing not long before been loſt to the great diſadvantage of the Countrey, while it was in the handes of the Saracens. The ſituation of this Fort is by Tyrius deſcribed to be ſixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the Eaſt of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manaſſes named in the Scripture are theſe: Golan, Bebeſthera, Miſpa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Iſraelites was called Robach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Miſpa of Gilead, we haue ſpoken by occaſion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis ſuperior & inferior, oft in Joſephus. Bebeſthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Baſan by ſome, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Beſet or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by ſome about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Joſua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Joſephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the miſt betweene Ceſaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the Weſt. When the ſnow of Libanus melteth it is very large, ſaith Brochard: otherwiſe more contract, leauing the mariſh ground on both ſides, for Lyons and other wild beaſts, which harbour in the ſhrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manaſſes, Joſephus names two places of ſtrength fortified by himſelfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Selencia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North ſide of this halfe Tribe of Manaſſes, and in the North-eaſt, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damaſcus, as Tedad, Chauran, and Chufar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the Weſt, of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47. 15. with which alſo agrees the place Nunab. 24. 8. where for Chauran, betweene Tedad, and Chufar-Henan, Zipbron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis regio, in Joſephus and Tyrius, whole bounds (as alſo the bounds of Geſſur and Mahathath or Maani, which were likewiſe borderers to Manaſſes toward the North-eaſt) are vnknewe: only that Geſſur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the Daughter of Thelmay King of Geſſur: by whom he had the moſt beautiful, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abſalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Hiſtorie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Iſraelites that dwell on the Eaſt of Iordan.

§. I.

Of the citie of Damaſcus and the diners fortunes thereof.

DAMAſCVS of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the moſt famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnes, and the Houſe of pleaſure; and is not onely remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the beſt Hiſtorians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes ſaith Joſephus thinke it to haue bene built by Hus the ſonne of Aram: of which opinion S. Hierome vpon Eſai ſeemeth to be: though in his Hebrew queſtions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damaſcus, the ſonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, a thing very vnliklie, ſeeing the citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damaſco. Dauid was the firſt that ſubiected it to the Kingdome of Juda, after the ouerthrow of Adad their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallitie: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadad their King of Sophena, (otherwiſe Syria Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damaſcena, and poſſeſt Damaſcus it ſelfe, and became an enemy to Salomon all his life.

The next King of Damaſcus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Aegypt from Dauid, and Ioab, when they ſlew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of *Aegypt*s wiues ſiſter: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was ſo called. This Adad returning againe became an enemy to Salomon, all his life, and (as ſome writers affirme) invaded Damaſcus, and thruſt Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine deſcends (as hereafter may be ſhewed in the catalogue of thoſe Kings of Syria) to whom the Aſſyrians & then the Græcians ſucceeded. This citie was exceeding ſtrong, compaſſed with waters from the riuers of Abanah, and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chryſorrhois the golden riuier. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitful of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very ſtrong Caſtle built as it ſeemes by the Florentines, after it became Chriſtian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citie adell. Againſt this Citie the Prophets Amos, Eſai, Jeremy, and Zacharias, prophecied that it ſhould be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of ſtones: In the time of the laſt Rezon and tenth King of the Damaſcens, Teglatphalſiſir invited by Achiz king of Juda carried away the naturals of Damaſcus into the Eaſt: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, ſaith Hierome vpon Eſai: which thing was performed by Sabmaſar according to Iunius, in his note vpon that place, ſue yeeres after the prophecie. In time it was reſtored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies, but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Aretius and Lolius. In the time of the Chriſtians it had an Archbiſhoppe: S. Hierome liuing, as he affirmeth vpon the Aſtes, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens:

being taken by Huomar their King from the Romanes, in the yere of our redemption 636. And in the yere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Leues King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hiersalem, Henry Duke of Anstria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa after ward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flandres, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recouer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians they failed of the enterprize.

In the yere 1262. Halon the Tartar incompt it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatend extreme torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Halon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yere 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken) He entred it and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners, thoseth retired into the Cattle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Cattle adioyning: he forbore the demolishing of the citie in respect of the beaute of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold & silver: but while he invaded Egypt they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly in his returne after three monethes siege he forst it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwarde to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victory he raised three towers with great Arte, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was reforted and repofest by the Soldane of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrefited it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing vp of their power:

NOW bee it that Damascus were founded by Itu the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Elixezer Abrahams Steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the boundes of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some regull, or pettie Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those partes had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadexer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betwene Batanes and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the Northeast parts of the holy land there were three chiefe principalities whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israhel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salemons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadexer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadexer when Dauid invaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth the leader of those succours, which were leuiued and sent to Hadad-Itzez from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadexer, Rezon, the Commander of his his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadexer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Ituraea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadexer was utterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in Abu saith S. Hierome, it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: But they for the most part were in league and peace with the Indians and Israhelites. But to returne to the kings of Syria, I meane of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascus, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath or Ituraea, to which I may adde Gishur, because it is so accounted in the 12. of San. 15. as ioyning in the territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Province, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our latter writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumaea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing invaded that region, and left Isaiah therein to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the kings seed, fled into Egypt: and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister as before, who hearing of Dauids death; and of the death of his Captaine Isaiah (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he returned againe, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus: and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adadexer the sonne of Reboab, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the style of Adad, the great God of the Affrians, saith Macrobius, which signified onenesse or Unitie. I also finde a citie called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes tooke the name or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-exer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadexer was of greatest power, it appeareth first because it is against him, that Dauid undertooke the warre: secondly because he leuiued 22000. Aramites out of the territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name, thirdly because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadexer was king, was an exceeding large territorie, and contained of Arabia the Desert as farre as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and the greater part of Arabia Petraea according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadexer, or Adad of Idumaea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israhel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euil that Adad did, the euil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumaea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zoba both, was Hezion, to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmon, or Tabrimmon, to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings. 40 For Ashak king of Iuda the sonne of Abiam, the sonne of Rabaam, the sonne of Salemon, being vexed and invaded by Basfa, the succellour of Nadab, the sonne of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad, the sonne of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hezion, king of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israhel (while Basfa fought to fortifie Rama against Ashak) thereby to blocke him vp, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israhel: who according to the desire of Ashak, hauing receiued his presents; willingly invaded the countrey of Nephthalim, and tooke diuers cities, and spoiles thence: Ashak in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Basfa had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse.

This Benhadads father Tabrimmon was in league with Ashak: and so was his father 50 Hezion; for Ashak requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabrimmon invaded Israhel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Ashak, spake as followeth. The Cities which my father tooke from thy father, I will restore restore

1. Reg. 20. v. 34.

restore: and thou shalt make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Bascha, at the request of Afa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab: and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Afa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betweene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Baschas time, and the seige of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when he inuaded Bascha, and after that 49. yeeres, ere he was taken by Achab, which make eightrie lacking one, it is vnlkely that Benhadad at such an age would make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe, but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Bascha and Omrî, and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by assaile of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites: besides 27000. which were crusb by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe stretch at libertie: to whom he rendreth those townes, that his father had taken from the predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refuseth to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab inuaded Gilead, and assieged the cite, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the sonne of Achab to be healed of the leprosie; and though Elizeus had healed him: yet he picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besiegeth Samaria againe, and being terrified thence from heauen, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate, if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: A-mos and Isieremie mention the towers of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successeur Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquitie, ignorant saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are compleate since their warres with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael the first king of the race of the Adads of Damascus was anointed by Elisba, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recouer his present sicknesse: He waged warre with Ioram; who receiued diuers wounds at the incounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Israel, he and the King of Juda, Ahasiah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azael continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, ouer Jordan. Hee then inuaded Juda, and tooke Geth, but by gifts from Iosias hee was auerted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which IEHOSAPHAT, IEHORAM, and AHAZIAH his fathers, Kings of Juda had dedicated; and which he himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the tresuries of the Lord: and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoyled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Afa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he inuited him to warre vpon Bascha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betwene Iosias and Azael, yet a part of his armie spoyled the other prouinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azael vexed Ioasias the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie, extremitie, as he left him but littie horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and ouerthrow of their power.

After Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for Iosias King of Israel, the sonne of the vnhappy Iosachaz, as he was foretold by Elisba the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three feuerall battels: and he lost all those cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Ioaschaz.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others of the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicholaus Damascus, cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Iosias recouered Damascus it selfe, to Judab saith the Geneues, but better in Iunius, utque recuperabat Damascus, & Chamathum Iehuda pro Israel; that is, And how he recouered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judea; for these cities sometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Storie. For when as Iehon the king of the tenne Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recouered the cities which Hazael had wonne from Israel; and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Raser, after Zonaras Rasdon, the 10. Adad, maketh league with Pekah, or Phacaz King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carie away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and beating out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Tetraglyphassar against Razin, who tooke him and beheaded him, and wonne Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Affrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned:

- 1 Adadazer, the sonne of Rehob.
- 2 Rezin the sonne of Eliahad, or Razin.
- 3 Hecion.
- 4 Tabremmon.

- 5 Benhadad who inuaded Bascha.
- 6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.

Hazael, whom Elisba foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the same who ouerthrew Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not probable, because that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Iosias, made the expedition 30. yeeres, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Iosias began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired; after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael tooke Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael which tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because hee could not at that time but be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth the second person in the Kingdome, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded.

8 Benhadad the third, whom Iosab King of Israel thrice ouertrew.
9 Rezin, or Rezin the last, who ioynd with Pekab King of Israel, against Inda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now betwene Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gesur, we finde that Tobin was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioran with presents, after Dauids victorie against Adadazer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. II. III.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought vnder the Affyrans, neuer recovered themselves againe.

OF Gesur wee finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his father Ammibur. To Talmai, whose daughter David married, it was that Ab-salon fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Saphena or Syria, Soba or Calefryia, there are two named, Rehob or Rehob the father of Adadazer, and Adadazer himselfe, and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better siting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And therace of these Kings of Syria (which became so potent, and ioynd Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the desert of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Achaz king of Juda waged the Affyrans Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascena, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Affyrans attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menabem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seat at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arhace, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Juda, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease posselt himselfe of the Citie of Nephtholim: leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanassar, whom Prothmy calleth Nabonassar, after the reuolt of Hofea, forced Samaris: and rent that Kingdome a sunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slauhtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hofea, whom Salmanassar ouerturned, happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanassar his sonne. For Sardanapalus perished, Osaruling Juda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolued, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Senacherib, the sonne of Salmanassar in vaine, and preferred for the time by God miraculously, was length length vterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samaris: the destruction of Israel beng in the ninth yeere of Hofea: that of Juda in the eleauenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria from the eighty yeere of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Hierodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successours the Seleucida reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had to doe both in warre and peace, being the only people, whose Historie in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitpa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibba.

11. 35. and E. d. 2. 3. 5. where Abichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Chemia, a Citie called Lodhadid: T his Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macc 12. 38. Maccabaeus.

Samarim or Tsemarim, named of Tsemari, one of the sonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land standeth iericho, one of the Toparchie, and the last of Juda; seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the Citie of Palmes. From the time of Iofus, who vterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Asab: in whose daies Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iofus: in which and other respectes Hof. 12. 14. calleth Iofua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the Southeast of iericho stood * Hulmon of the Leuites, of which Iof. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Iof. 6. 15. and 6. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is 1. Reg. 17. 36.

Iof. 6. 19.
* Chron. 6. 60.
This Hulmon is called Hale-meth, whence they make a new Citie Al-meth, as this Tribe had given five Cities to the Leuites, so much mention in the Scripture, where Iofua first eate of the fruites of the lande, circumcised all those borne in the Deserts, and celebrated the Passeouer.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Dent. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted 10. 5. 9. Ob de uoluntatem probi Aegyptiaci, because their foreskinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Colles preputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geloth, as appears by comparing the places, 1. 5. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Iof. 22. 13. and Geloth signifieth borders. * It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two hills Garizim and Hebal: vpon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitpa of Beniamin (of which also we reade oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midd of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason * Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yeerly to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitpa neere the West sea, towards the land of the Philistines.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yeerly to come, is * Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal which was the first place, where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Jordan from whence it was carried to Silo, & thence to Riuiath-Iherusim, and at length to Hierusalem here in Gilgal it was that Iofus pitched vp the twelve stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it, by which Stone, as it is set downe Iof. 4. it appeares, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel bewell Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitpa, whither also Samuel came yeerly to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held; as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistines 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Machabaeus gathered the Jewes (when Hierusalem was possessed by the Heathens) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationis fuerat Mitpa ante Israel. Touching this Mitpa, to auoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitpa of Inda, of which Iof. 15. 38. * Mitpa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad; Mitpa of the Manites, where Daniel for a while held himselfe, commending his parents to the King of Mosh 1. Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitpa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Machabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Iewry as Gouernour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Jewes) he was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall blood of Inda, as it is Hierem. 41.

Neere vnto this Mitpa, the * Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Het-zeor, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistines.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and so how it was taken by the illiue of Iofeph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Iof. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the spices, as it is Iudg. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacobs vision: and how

Ieroboam

Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calues here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Beth-uen, that is, the house of Vanitie Iof. 4. 15. & 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so wel knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them ouer.

The territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the tenn Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ieroboam (of which 2. Chr. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdom of Inda: and so it continued, as appears by the Storie of Iofia: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. whence those coastes * 1. Macc. 1. 34. are called Aphrenath, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenn Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jewes, ouer of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Elephraim, which Iof. 18. 23. is called Hophran, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, * it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde ouer Rama in the Tribe of Inda (as it seemes because Mat. 2. it appeares that it bordered Bethlehem) and also ouer of Brocard and Beidenbach make Silo to haue bene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three haue no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Affer, as it seemes, we haue testimonie Iof. 19. 29. and of an other in Nephthali Iof. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim 1. S. 25. 1. which more often is called * Ramatha, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-Tophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioseph of Aramathaim Mat. 27. 57 was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we reade 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the vtermost South-border of the Kingdom of the tenn Tribes: for which cause Basia in the time of Isa King of Inda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Babylonia, as it appears Esa. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Basia had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 2. 52.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the tenn Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Inda: whence 2. Reg. 23. we reade that Iofiah through all his Kingdom, cuen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Judges had almost vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomus confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished Esa. 10. 27. of which word * Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, he imagineth Gabaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appears Iud. 19. 13. where the Leuit with his wife not able to reach to Rama, tooke vp his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1. Sa. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some tower or Citadell called Rama: where Iunius reade in exce. 8. for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings place in this citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the College of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Iof. which Iof. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-uen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe as is proued Nehem. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iofia c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Iof. 8. 28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuam; Another

*The word Nethunim or Nethinai, is as much as dati (as it were a Deo dati) or as lunus explains it dediti; it is vfed, 1 Chron 9.2. and in Esdars and Nethunim of-

Citie of cheife note reckoned Ief. 18.25. in this Tribe was Gibbon, the cheife Citie of the Leuites : whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to faue their liues, is fet downe Ief. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinim or Proflitits : and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the houle of God : which oath of fauing these Gibeanites broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine 2. Sam. 21.1. This Gibben or Gibbon with Aimen and Iebah (of both which we haue spoken) and with Ulanotheth the metall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were faid Ief. 21.28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Ulanotheth was Neb, as appears 1. Reg. 2.26. where Ebiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Ulanotheth : It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem. 9.31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-earim : yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloodthed, which Saul raifed in this place (as it is fet downe 1. Sam. 21. and 2.) in the iudgement of Iehus, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Michas is proved to have been a place of the Tribe of Manasse. Michas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Ezai 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Adigum in this Tribe. In Michas Saul had his Campe 1 Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibea to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Maccabees his aboad. 1 Macc. 9. 73. Of Gilgala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any here in Manasse, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, hee faileth with his parents to Tharsis, of this I finde no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance Lom, and come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes and Governours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Iof. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

AT what time Iherusalem was built (which afterward became the Princecess of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But *according to others, that Citic out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his returne from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the river of Jordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hiernſalem (when fouer or by whom fouer built) was a principall Citie in Iofus his time: yet not ſo renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in thoſe daies and before) of all the Cannites. Adonizedek (whom Iofus ſlew) was then King of Hiernſalem. That it was belonging to the Iebufites it is manifeſt: for how long fouer they held it before Moſes time, they were Maſters and Lords thereof almoſt 400. yeeres after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebufis (the children of Iebufus the ſonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And ſo much did that Nation rely on the ſtrength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people ſhould defend it.

David after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Iebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolima. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and wals, could not any where in the world bee exampled : and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foote of depth : cut out of the very rocke : and 250. foote of breadth : whereof the like hath seldome beene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Agyptus, and that the Kingdome of the Sewes was cut afunder, Sylphar King of Egypt, and his predecessor, having bred pur for that purpose, Adad the Idumæan, and Ierobabam, Salmons feruant; and both married to AEgyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Sylphar first invaded the Territorie of Iuda: entred Hiersusalem, and fack it, and became Maſter not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all thoſe ſpoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadezer, Telus, the Ammonites, and other Nations. 'Tis againe fackt and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioaſ King of Iſrael, while Amafia the twelfth King thereof governed Iuda.

Nor long after Ahas the fifteenth King of Iuda impouerished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalassar with the treasures thereof. And Manassé the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Ahas, by the vaults made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merozech, lost the remaine, and the very bottome of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Ioaquin then reigning. But this vngateful, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but perfiting in all kinde of impie, filling the Citie euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raiſed vp that great Babylonian King Nebuchodeneſor, as his ſcourage and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the wals and towers which embraced them, euen and leuell with the duſt: carried away the ſpoiles with the Princes and people, and cruſht them with the heauie yoke of bondage and ſeruitude full 70. yeeres, inſomuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed vp field, Hieruſalem a heape of ſtone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars, but (as Hieremie ſpeaketh) Euen the birds of the ayre ſcorned to ſieue it, or the beaſts to tread on that deſtiled ſoile.

30 Then 70 yeeres being expired, according to the Prophetic of Daniel, and the Jewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie enough: and the Citie meane while inhabited, and without waies or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nebemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoiled by Bisgates, or Vagages, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolemeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Partian expedition tooke as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolemaeus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolemaeus Philadel- phus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amere-d partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vsurping and wicked, yet magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that he left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the daies of Salomon.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romanes.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ (as : and after his death and ascension, it co continued about 40. yeres. But then did Titus the Romaine, being stirred vp, by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death; and to punish the Iewes insinill ingratitude, incompaill it with the Romaine armie, and became Lord thereof. Hee began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, and with the ciuile dissension, opprest them within the walles; a forcible enemie assailed them without. The Idumaeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besiging to the consummation of the victorie, eleven hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe, and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleue that there had beene any such place of habitation. Onely the three Hierodian towers (workes most magnificent, and ouertopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romaine garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more thing that thereouer became victorious.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered here and there in Iudaea, and other Provinces, beganne againe to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Romane State; but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to revolt, and rebell, Alius Adrianus the Emperour laughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the reft, making it good which Chrift himfelfe had foretold; That there fhould not fland one flone vpon another, of that vngratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he rooke one part without the wall, wherein flode Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulchre of Chrift, and excluding of the reft the greateft portion, hee againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Alia Capitolina. In the gate toward Bethle, he caufed a Sowe to be cut in marble, and fet in the front thereof, which hee did in despite of the Iewes Nation: making an Edift, that they fhould not from thenceforth enter into the Citie, neither fhould they dare fo much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length, by all 40 Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

It was afterward in the 636. yeere after Christ; taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Baillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Chrissf, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained vnder the succellours of Godfrey 88. yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Aegypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes call out the Aegyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzamobaree, or the Holy City. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the world haue with their inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwrecke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not only to punish the impietie impetic of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slaucric; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they posselt; of the wals and buildings, yea of the foyle and the beasts that fedde thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect, lost all her fertilitye, and fruitfullnesse; witnesseth the many hundreds of thousands which it fedde in the dayes of the Kings of India and Israell; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beast that belonged to Amelek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe, neither was it enough that Abraham himselfe was sowned, but that his mouebles were also consumed and brought to ashes.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Jewes.

20  F the original of the Jewes, prophane writers have conceived diversely and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Ægyptians. Others affirme that while Isis governed Ægypt, the people were so increased, as Ieroglasmus, and Indus ledde thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because hee was taken up and saued out of the waters. But Isifine, of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Jewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith hee was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israh had tenne sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Inda; so called of Indas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of Israhel he calleth Isoph: who being brought up in Ægypt, became learned in magical Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Isoph (saith hee) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and left they should infect others, were banished Ægypt. Further, hee telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Deserts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seventh day, for this cause euer after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, least discouering their viceciannesse, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Ægyptians. These and like fables hath Isifine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them in affirming That in the inmost Oratory of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Affe, which they adored.
But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fift booke of his owne Histo- rie truly confessed of the Jewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature; and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like to this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Iudas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jewes.

Claudius Tola draws them from Indians, whose parents were Spartan and Thebis; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these Cited by Stephanus in Indica.

ports seeme to haue been gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruerted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Floud; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes; in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the fathers; and leaders of the He- brewes: all which faunings, as touching the Jewes and their originals, Iosephus against Apion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the Children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Jewes, from Araban; hauing mistaken the name of Abra- ham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Isra- el, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Inda, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Judeans or Jewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes; the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation vnderwent, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a pollicie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King; and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before wee intreat, wee are first to speake of their Government vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua:
 with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of OTHONIEL.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the ad-uise of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: It pleased God to direct the Tribe of Iuda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to vndertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adoni-bezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellst Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites.

This tyrants crueltie as else where hath bene signified, they returned in the same 30 kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iust iudgement against himselfe.

The Tribes of Iuda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this interregnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Askelon, Ekron, and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites afterward redified.
They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse wordes that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authoritie among them: and that hee with the aduise of 40 Phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if any thinke that they proceeded without a chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings witnesseth the contrarie. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares Ios. 10: 39: that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprize, he promised his Daughter Achisab: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behauiour in that seruice was such, as (iuxta vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Iuda made warre with their borderers, from whom they only recovered the mountainous Countreies (for they 50 could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleys, because they had Chariots of Iron.) Iud. 1: 19:

The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories:
in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countreies: and fort them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And Iud. 1: 34:

now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Ed-Iders being also consumed, who better aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only ioyne themselues in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idolls of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead Gods of the Canaanites and Amerites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their Idolatry, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusban Nisibathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeares, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othaniel to bee their Iudge and 10 Leader: who by Gods assisted, deliuered his bretheren from oppression: and infort the Aramites to returne into their owne Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning, after which the Israelites had peace fortie yeares, during all the time of *Othaniel*s gouernment. This Othaniel is thought by Tostatus to haue bene the yonger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Judges he is twice called Othaniel the sonne of *Caleb*s yonger brother. Others doe rather interpret those wordes (*Caleb*s yonger brother) as if they signified the meaneft of his kindred. Indeed it is not like-ly, that *Caleb*s Daughter should marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othaniel should haue bene the meaneft of the kindred. Wherefore we may better thinke that he was the Nephew of Caleb (as some learned men ex-20 pound it) and as the very wordes of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneh, and Othaniel the sonne of Cenaz, *Caleb*s yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers sonne; to whom it was not only lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cosen German *Caleb*s daughter.

How long it was from the death of Iosuah to the gouernment of Othaniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue bene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Disb was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best writers are of opinion that between the times of Iosuah and Othaniel that ciuill warre brake out betweene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites wife. For it is written that in 30 those daies there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Iuda led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to haue bene when Iosuah was dead, and before the gouernment of Othaniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Gouer-nours, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attended such a ciuill Warre, if their power had bene as great, as it was in the menaging of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of bloud, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such 40 numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

THere liued in this age of Othaniel, Pandion or Pandareus, according to Homer, the first King of Athens: who beganne to rule in the twentieth yeare of Othaniel, and gouerned fortie yeares. Hee was father to E-50 richus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly men-tioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius or Liber pater: vnder whome Linus the Musitian liued. In his time time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharfus, were built.

Iuda and Daclylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron: but Genesius hath taught vs the contrarie, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in iron and braille. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Elands time. But S. Augu-Gen. 4. 22. line making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus of whose parentage there is a little agreement. Kines vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augu-line de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opi-nions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. La-10 lartius and Eusebius make him natue of Attica: and the sonne of Elenfus King of Elenfus: which Elenfus by carefull industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine, T his when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boate, which carried in her Proue a grauen or carued Serpent: who became he made exceeding great speede to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: he was slain by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the aire.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othaniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Iuda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow: for the Chronologers; both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused if in these comparisons I erre with others of bet-ter iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselues to conuerse with these ancient Kings, and with the very year when they beganne to rule) haue hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off: and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors them-selves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne 30 disagreement and contention in those elder daies, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, since his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reignes of Heathen Kings and Prin-ces; but euen in computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth: and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seauente Weekes, and in what not? Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments 40 are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many waies to vngouer the Sunne, that the daies thereby are made more darke, and the clouides more condent than before. I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations; and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeare, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgments. Nam in praeis rebus veritas non ad vnguem quaerenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, saies Diodore.

§. III.

Of EHVDs time, and of PROSERPINA, ORITHYA, TEREVS, TANTALVS, TITYVS, ADMETVS, and others that liued about these times.

After the death of Othoniel when Israel fell back to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Moad to invade and suppress them: to performe which he ioynd the forces of Ammon and Amalee vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from) thereby to make them feele the difference betwene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations, had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedily folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen yeares vnder Eglon King of the Moadites, and his confederates. Yet as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weak man though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustice of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguishe, he assured himselfe of the following victorie: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to chooseth a King to command, and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassador to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access vpon the pretence of some secret to be revealed: he pierst his bodie with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For sodainly after his returne, he did repasse Jordan, and invading the Territorie of Moad: ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Sansar his Successor had miraculously slaine 600. Philistines with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeares from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the daies of Ehud Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, traualled into Moad, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeares which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians: otherwise Pluto, Rale Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrrius with whom Hercules and Theseus ioynd themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrius, and care him in peeces, and had also wearied Theseus, but that Hercules speedily refused him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering of Theseus out of Hell. But Zeux, as I take it, hath writtten this storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrius such he, attempted to Reale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrrius were both taken, and because Pyrrius being was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner til Hercules by the instigation of Eurythem deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossians which which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting neare the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaine Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The Riuer of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out the same Hills. There is an other Nation of the Molossians in Thessalie: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, such Plutarch in his Greeke quations.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erethreus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North winde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus 10 rauished Philomela, of which the fable was deuised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forth her in the passage, and withall cut out her tongue that shee might not complaine; perswading Progne his Wife that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behauiour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne caused her only Sonne Irys to be cut in peeces, and set before Tereus her husband, so dreft as it appeared to be some other ordinarie foode: of which when he had eaten his fill: shee caused his head, handes, and feete, to be presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speede towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets haied, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed Strabo finds to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias 10. hath built neare the Rocks Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which as also by Pausanias the name Daulis, where these thinges are supposed to haue beene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryssa, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not farre from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good 30 to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens, made that alliance with a neighbour King from whom he might haue succour, rather then with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryssa, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue beene partly because, as Pausanias saies: Daulide nec midsicant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Lirandines: As if a Swallow remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and to her sister, did for euer hate that place.

Neare this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Praxus King of the Argines, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Inno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countiees; where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the 47. yeare of Ehud, Troas beganne to raigne in Dardanis, and gaue it his owne name, about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Dolphos, deuised the Heracleid Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maeones. Of Tantalus was deuised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of loue: and some to the couetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Dionysius and Didymus in Zeux, giue him an other Mother. He was said to be the sonne of Iupiter, as some will haue it, because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more pretious: he caused his owne Sonne to be slaine and dreft for the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders:

Shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seeke after diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuised, that he had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by thereof. Of whom Ouid:

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
TANTALVS, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here TANTALVS in water seekes for water, and doth misse,
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the Gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse.

TANTALVS à labijs sitiens fugientia captat Flumina quidrides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting TANTALVS doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laugh'st thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the Gods to vaine and vnworthie men, that hee was therefore by them in 30 that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus.

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Cœtans conuiuiis
Nectar Ambrosiamq. dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owneage to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant that the secrets of Diuinitie, ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a soule stomach, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reuerend mysteries are often peruerred by an vnclane and defiled minde.

Mark. 4. 11. To you it is given (saith Christ in MARKE) to know the myserie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without all things be done in parables. So is it said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples a-part. And therefore doth Gregoric Nazianzen enscricke vpon a place of S. PAVL. Quod si PAVL licuisset esset, e, quorum ipsi cognitionem celum tertium & usque ad illud progressio suppeditaui, fortasse de Deo nobis aliquid amplius conseraret. If PAVL might haue vittered the things, the knowledge 50 whereof the third heauens, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reclin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Aino lyram expone-re, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut Sui tubam, & sciam graculus, & vingenta Scaribens:

bus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana pateficerent, que recitando facilius, quam loquendo apprehenderantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to leaue mysteries: which he would handle as a swine doth a trumpet, or a lay a viall, or Scariabus and vnclane flies soueraigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples: that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their couered meanings.

10 But to proceede with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where shee was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselte therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Cyant, affirms that his bodie occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homers.

Porrectusq. nouem TITYVS per ingera terra
Afidius atro viscere passus aues:

Nine furlongs stretcht lies TITYVS, who for his wicked deedes
The hungrie birds with his renewing liuer daily feedes.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocia, it was fained by the Poets to the terror of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Thessalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued as a Heard-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him aduanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus he crost the Hellefont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Nepitune, hee was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid which saith:

Iliou aspicies, firmatasq. turribus altis
Maenia, APOLLINEAE structa canore byra.

Strong Iliou thou shalt see with walls and towers high Built with the harpe of wise APOLLO's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his handes, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the quisq. diti, Aegariens witnesse, saith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the daies of Deborah, liued Perseus the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus to seeke their aduenture on Affrica side) Medusa the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakely accompanied as shee hunted, neare the Lake 50 Triton, was surpris'd and slaine: whose beaurie when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beaurie whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonish'd which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Triton a Lake of Affrica which the called Pollutius.

Hist.

Cecrops the second of that name and 7. King bf Athens, and Arifus the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reignes, as is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the sonne of Glancus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia the wife of Pratus of the Argives, to accompanie her, but refusing it, shee accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: wherupon Pratus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, between him and his Sonne in law Jobates: giuing secret order to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it dishonorable to lay violent handes on him: imployed him against Chimera, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the Gods (as the report is) pitying his innocencie, sent him the winged Horfe Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the Souldiers of Perseus in Affrica, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: vpon which beast Bellerophon ouer-came Chimera: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arriued to Jobates in safetie: whom Jobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to fly vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdainig, caused one of his flaming fires so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, wher he fell blinde: of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heauen: and being fed in Iupiters owne stable, Aurora begd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vnderferved aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreame hazard, or rather certaine death, he found both deliuerance and honor: but waxing ouer-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euer-during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimera, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimera was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley of such swiftnesse that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the inuention of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other explications are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnikely, that Chimera was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Eneides.

Ion also from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquite of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Eubus time: Homer calls them Iaones, which hath a neare resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps also it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient: placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Iofua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

¶ IIII.

¶ IIII.

Of DEBORA and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had liued in peace and plentie to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, who were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie; so securitie as fruitfull in being getting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sinnes were againe ripe for punishment, Tabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territorie of Israel, and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who encouraged Barac to leaue a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seem to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harnoth the chiefe holds of Tabin, were in Nephtalim. So in the daies of Iephtha the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them; as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the selfe hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Mozabite: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman; to free them from the yoke of Canaan; and to kill the valiant Sihon by Jephtha, Benier was so was it his will at other times; to worke the like great things by the weakest means. For the mightie Assyrian Nabuchadonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resolute, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causes of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the same humilie of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell; or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waies of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iofua: Sometimes by the ministerie of men, as when he ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. He caused the Mozabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Idumites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the fight of Iehosaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these wordes: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Tabin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Tabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfulnesse, and great mercies, shee sheweth the weak estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations in these wordes: Was there a shield or speare scene among sortie thousand of Israel? he also sheweth how the Israhelites were scattered and amaid, some of them confined ouer Jordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: so that the Asserites kept the Sea-coast, and forooke their habitations towards the Land, and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neare the place of the battaile (be-like fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Iael

the wife of Heber the Kente, who nailed Sisera her Tent : shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, hee decideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes : and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, hee directeth her praises and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares was translated to Myceana : The translation of this Kingdome Pausanias writeth to this effect : After Danaus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lyncus diuide the Kingdome : of which Acrisius being eldest held Argos it selfe : Praxus his brother possesse Ephyræ or Corinth, and Thrynius, and other Cities with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Thrynius, which witnesseth Praxus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae : whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Ladie being exceeding faire, it is so fained that Iupiter turned him selfe into a golden shower : which falling into her lap, begat her with child : the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthie man, corrupted her keepers with gold : and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne : who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Cresius) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Praxus : and built Myceana. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise : and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Pharac hath this wittie obseruation.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who beganne to raigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac : from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. yeares. T his Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. It was the Daughter of this Inachus : whom the Egyptians called Ipsi.

*Phoroneus, Apis,
Argus,
Piræus,
Phorbas,
Triopas,
Crotopus,
Sthenelus,
Danaus, Lyncus,
Abas, Acrisius, Pelops.*

After the translation to Myceana, Mar. Scotus finds these Kings.

*Perseus, Sthenelus,
Eurysthenus,*

Atræus and Thyestes The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia : Atræus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

*Agamemnon, Ægysibius,
Orestes,
Tisamenus, Pentibulus and Cometes.*

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last : beginning with Eurysthenus : and ending with Pentibulus. In Tisamenus time the Heracidae returned into Peloponnesus : of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Deborah, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia : and Isis who built Ilium : with others mentioned in our Chronological table, as contemporaries with Deborah.

that liued in this Age.

DE DEBORAH and Barac being dead, the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Judge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had inioyed any quiet or prosperitie : the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatrie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access : their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies : and in harvest time by themselves and the multitude of their cattle destroying all that grew vpon : covering the fields as thick as grasse-hoppers : which seruitude lasted seauen yeares.

Then

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Josab, afterward called Jerubbab: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts; Each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loude a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteemed the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon because hee made warre without their assistance, being then greedie of glorie, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt haue beene their selues hap-
 10 pie by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a mild answer followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with trauaile, and wearie euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kingdoms of the Midianites: which had sued themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which 20 were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth fought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes he performed: to wit, that hee would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thornes and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their bretheren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: I may presume to make coniecture; it seems likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, and in the way of all invasions to be made by the Moabites, and Ammonites, and Midianites, into Israel, had either 30 made their owne peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their armie, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both enie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safetie of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrarie successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard, and want, than that such men as they mislike should be the Authors or actors of any glorie or good 40 to either.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoever it were that hee refreshed himselfe and his wearie and hungrie Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunitie, and pursued his former victorie to the vttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surprised them, & slaughtered those 50 15000. remaining; hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall hee tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had exequuted Gideons bretheren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request flew them with his owne hands: his Son whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it, and in his returne from the consummation of this meruailous victorie, hee tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his bretheren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts

 Ind. 8. 10.

debts of crueltie and mercie are neuer left vn-satisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth with great and vnusall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes, al but one; murdered by his owne bastard Abimelech. The like Analogie is obscured by the Rab-
 10 bines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Aegyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to bee slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the redde sea. And hercof a world of examples might bee giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

10 In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraigntie ouer them; and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childe reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden ea-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Israelites neighbors, and mixt with the Midianites vsed to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred Shekels of gold, which makes of ours. 2380. liif we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar:
 20 And because he conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew like, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen belonging to the High Priest onely, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests which the Le- 30 uites vsed, and so did David when he daunced before the Arke: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demaund how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to de-40 stroy 120000. of their enemies: and afterward 15000. which remained, wee may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughteer, and pursuite; for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out
 50 of Nephtalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in the tents behind him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon Aegreus the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euristheus King of Mycene: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelopon, who bare domi-
 60 nion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus; the Kingdome of Mycene fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus who, holding his brother in ienialousie as an attempter both of his wife and crowne; slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be dreit did therewith feast their fa-
 70 ther. But this crueltie was not vnteuenged: For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grandchildren, and all the linage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beeie done which are written of Dadalus and Icarus: Dadalus they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos King of Crete for succour, where for his excellence workemanshippe he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth like vnto that of Ae-
 80 gypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Poliphuz the Queen; that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe satiate her lust, a thing no lesse vn-natural than incredible, had not that shame-
 90 lesse Emperour Demitian exhibited the like beaustly spectacle openly before the people of Rome in his Amphitheater; of purpose as may seeme to verifie the olde fable. For so it appears by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew as a goodly Pageant in those viciou times.

*Iunctam Paphiaen Disce credite Tauri Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Caesar longeva vetustas Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Paphiaen, Servius makes a lesse vnhonest construction of it, thinking that Daddus was of her counsell, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Amos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with child, and that the being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Amos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Minotaur, halfe a Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discovered, and Daddus appointed, to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Daddus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold was ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Daddus that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes and hands, whereas those that preceded him could onely present the bodie and head of those men whom they cared to counterfayt, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarke who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Daddus found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollo, & Terpsichore who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. Hee wrate of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of flying Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules: his scholler with his owne harpe.

Againe, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus are thought to haue bene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Carinthian Armie ledde by Oedipus ouercome. But that which was written of her 39 propounding of riddles to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes which she defended, and by Oedipus dissoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the bodie of a Lyon for her crueltie. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx were more probable did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despitefull part, with her owne troope she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans till by Oedipus ouerthrowen. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre 40 with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He posset himselfe of Megara by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released as shall bene shewed when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thala. In the end hee was slaine at Camirinus or Camicus in Sicily by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Daddus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Islands.

To this time are referred many dedes of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odd cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth confirme, reporting that there was such a bodie found by Sertorius the Roman 50 in Exhis, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lie. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Euſebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, hee was fained to bee the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S.

Augustine

Augustine affirms that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra all which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtile Sophist.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonauts.

About the elcuenth yeere of Gideon, was that famous expedition of the Argonauts: of which many fabulous discourses haue bene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Eson, who was Iason father, reigning in Iolcus a towne of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heede of him that ware but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heede: to which question when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchis, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a shippe built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the Counsell of Pallas: wherein hee procured all the brauest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhus the Master of the shippe, Orpheus the famous Poet, Caſtor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Pelias, sonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Aiax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Southſayer, Melæger of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Alcalaphus and Ialmenius of Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Læertes the father of Ulyſſes, Atalanta a warlike virgine, Idas and Lyncæus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Caſtor and Pollux slew Caſtor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncæus by Pollux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos; the women of which Island, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Haue, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blowes, inso much that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by daylight they perceived, with many teares they solemnized his funnell. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Myſia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elateus, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Myſia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myſia the Argonauts sailed into Bythina, which then was peopled by the Bebryes, the auncient inhabitants of the Country, ouer whom Amicus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorle battes, in which kinde of fight hee had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryes in reuenge of his death flew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmydeſſus, a towne in Thrace (perhaps of Thracia Adriatica) wherein Phineus a Southſayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my Counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be couered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their swords, and pursued them through the ayre; some say 10 that both the Harpyes and the young men died of wearinesse in the flight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did covenant with the youthes, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed: for this good turne Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withal of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them into the passage: and if that passed safe, then to adventure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vaine. They did so, and perceiving that the pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poepe was 20 bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the Gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a shippe, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Soothsayer of their company was slaine by a wild boare; also here Typhis died: and Ancus vnderooke to steare the shippe. So they passed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the riuer Phasis, which runnes through the land of Colchis: when they were entred the haven, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable 30 goeth, promised to doe, if he alone would yoke together two brazen hooff bulles, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragons teeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These bulles were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Aetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexitie about this taske, Medea the daughter of Aetes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuily to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith she bad him to annoint both his bodie and his armour, which would preserue him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would arise out from the ground, from the teeth which hee should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedie which inconvenience, shee bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, hee againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approving such his desire, that hee deuised how to destroy the Argonautes, and burne their shippe, which Medea perceiving, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung vpon an oake in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking 40 away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the shippe Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abfirtus.

Aetes vnderstanding the practises of Medea, prouided to pursue the ship, whom when when Medea perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, & cutting him in pieces she scattered his limbes in diuerse places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his sonne hee buried in a place which thereupon he called Tomis; the Greeke word signifieth Disuision. Afterwards he sent many of his subiectes to seeke the shippe Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter offended with the slaughter of Abfirtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abfirtides, there the shippe Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Circe, from the murder of Abfirtus. Now they thereupon sayling betwene the coastes of Lybia, and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Aea, whereto Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they layed by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. Only Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Pennis rauished, and carried to Lybiuum in Sicilie to dwell.

10 Having past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Thetis and the Nereides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beues of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra the Iland of the Phaeaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while the men of Colchis that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the shippe Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Coreyra, others in the Ilands Abfirtides, and some coming to the Phaeaces, there found the shippe Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if hee were not Iasons 30 wife they should haue her, but if shee were already married he would not take her from her husband. Arete the wife of Alcinous hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchis not daring to returne home, stayed with the Phaeaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland Minos reigned, who had a man of brasse giuen to him (as some of the Fable say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his bodie reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was closed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome wasto runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When hee saw the shippe Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that he slew him by potions, which made him madde; others that 40 promising to make him immortal, he drew out the naile that stopp his veine, by which means all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Paan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Aegina where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly from Aegina they sailed by Eubaea and Loeris home to Iolcus, where they arrived, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Iason, vnderstand the myserie of the Philosophers Stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also other superflue Chymists, draw the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece, was ment a booke of Parcement, which is of sheepe skinne, and therefore called golden, 50 because it was taught therein how other mettals might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Iason wisdom, and moderation, which ouercommeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Deralius, that the Storie of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeed to robbe Colchis, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepes falling falling torrents which with downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting vse to set many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents, in the passage betwene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those herie bulles, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrrens, Seyls and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall moralls: all which Homer afterward vsed (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Vlysses his trauailes on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholab, and Iair, and of the Lapytha, and of Theseus, Hippolytus &c.

FTER the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembreing what offers had bene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his three perpetual Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modestie) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraigntie, praefixed with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was naturie) to make election of himselfe, who being easily moued to the glorie, to haue a King of their owne, redily condescended: and the better to inable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assit his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many, of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which hee executed on one stone, a crueltie exceeding all that hath bene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euertlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which labourerth the preseruacion of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begeth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane soeuer) which may serue it: remembreing nothing, what soeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleadge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnder takers, and rather praisth the adventure than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and beganne in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also preceeded his creation, yet hath the Diuell which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one out of date, and to praefice the other, as besetting euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham the youngest of Gideons sonnes hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assitting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happie estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had not power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whome and how to be gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with it's fatnesse, the Figge tree with sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. He also foretold them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right ledde on) Gad the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and massacred it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped; and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally brased, he commaunded his owne page to pierce his bodie thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Gouernment, the Lapytha and *Centaur*es made warre against the Thebanes. These Nations were defended of Apollon and were the first in those parts that deuised to mannage horses, to bridle and to fit them: in so much as when they first came downe from the mountains of Pindus, into the plains, those which had neuer seene horsemens before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans, when Ferdinando Cortes the Spanish first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholab of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemeth to bee descended of Iair the sonne of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Haboth Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his auncester had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus beganne to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Alcum, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ranfome, hee rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy; and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as hee became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof Laocete by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione,ooke Helen the wife of Menelaus the cause of the warre which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptunus and Aethra: but Plutark in the storie of his life findes him begotten by Aegeus, of whom the Graecian sea betwene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so farre as hee forst them to pay him leauen of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom hee inclosed within a Labyrinth, to bee deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which hee begat on Pisiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: Among these leauen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countie of that stancie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing posselt himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, hee receiued from her a bottome of thred, by which hee conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, hee found a readie way to returne. But whereas his father Aegeus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie; hee should vse a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournfull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegus despoiling the ships of Theſeus with a blacke faile caſt himſelfe over the rockes into the ſea, afterward called of his name Aegum.

One of the firſt famous actes of Theſeus, was the killing of Seyron, who kept a paſſage betweene Megara and the Peloponneſian Iſlands, and threw all whom hee maſtered into the ſea, from the high rockes. Afterward hee did the like to Cercyon, by wreſtling, who vſed by that Arte to kill others. Hee alſo ridde the Country of Procrustes, who vſed to bend downe the ſtrong limbes of two trees, and ſtrained by cordes ſuch as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by their ſpringing backe tare them aſunder. So did hee roote out Periphetes and other miſchievous theeves and murderers. Hee ouerthrew the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vaſſations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Theſeus hauing taken their Queene Hippolyta priſoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phadra, falling in loue, and hee reſolving to abuſe his fathers bed, Phadra perſwaded Theſeus that his ſonne offered to force her: after which it is ſaid that Theſeus beſought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his ſonnes, by ſome violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage ſent out his Sea-Calues, as Hippolytus paſſed by the ſea ſhore, and ſo affrighted his horſes, as caſting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miſerable and vnderſerued deſtine, when Phadra had heard of, ſhee ſtrangled herſelfe. After which it is ſaid, that Diana entreated Aſculapius to ſet Hippolytus his pieces together, and to reſtore him to life: which done, becauſe hee was chaſte, ſhee ledde him with her into Italie, to accompanie her in her hunting, and field ſports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his father ſought his life, thinking to eſcape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and receiued many woundes in forcing his paſſage and eſcape; which woundes Aſculapius, to wit, ſome ſkillfull Philician, or Chirurgeon healed againe, after which hee paſt into Italy, where hee liued with Diana, that is the life of a hunter, in which hee moſt delighted. But of theſe ancient prophane Stories, Plutarch ſaith well, that as Cosmographers in their deſcriptions of the world, where they finde many vaſt places whereof they know nothing, fill the ſame with ſtrange beaſtes, birdes, and fiſhes, and with Mathematicall lines, ſo doe the Græcians Hiſtorians and Poets, imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous diſcourſes. True it is, that Theſeus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the firſt that gathered the Athenians, from being diſperſt in thinne and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuſing them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end baniſhed. Some ſay per Oſtreiſmum, by the Lawe of Lottes, or names written on ſhelles, which was a deuice of his own.

Hee ſtole Helen (as they ſay) when ſhe was 50. yeeres olde, from Aphidna, which Citie Caſtor and Pallus ouerturned, when they followed after Theſeus to reouer their ſiſter. Eraſſtratus and Pausanias write that Theſeus begat her with child at Argos, where ſhee erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to be true, and ſo doth Ouid, Nō tamen ex facti fruſtum tulit ille petum &c. The rape Euebius findes in the firſt of Iair, who gouerned Iſrael 22. yeeres, to whom ſucceeded Iephth or Iephth fixe yeeres, to whom Iſaan who ruled ſeaſen yeeres, and then Habdon eight yeere: in whole time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theſeus had a childe by her in the firſt of Iair, (at which time wee muſt count her no leſſe than ſiſteene yeere olde, for the women did not commonly beginne ſo young as they doe now) ſhee was then at leaſt two and ſiſtie yeere olde at the deſtruction of Troy: and when ſhee was ſtoolen by Paris eight and thirte: but here in the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Euebius and Bunting with Halicarnasſeus doe doe in effect conſent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the firſt yeere of Demophon King of Athens, the ſuccellour of Aſteſchus, the ſuccellour of Theſeus, ſeaſeateene dayes before the Summer Tropique, and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians croſt the Helleſpont into Thrace, & wintred there, and in the next ſpring that they nauigated into Sclia, where wintred the ſecond yeere, the next ſummer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Anguſtine hath it otherwiſe, that when Polyphides gouerned Sicyon, Mneſtheus Athens, Tautanes Aſſyria, Habdon Iſrael, then Aeneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twentie ſhippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hercof more at large in the ſtorie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phellus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His ſuccellours, Adraſtus who reigned foure yeeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, ſo is alſo Mneſtheus King of Athens, and Atræus, who held a great part of Peloponneſus. In Aſſyria, during the gouernment of theſe two peaceable Iudges, Mitreus and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypte Amenophis, the ſonne of Ramſes, and afterwards Annenenſis.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the moſt ancient that euer Greece Poet or Hiſtorian wrote of. Wherefore the Romane Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly againſt the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

—Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rei unquam & mundi, ſemperque æterna ſuere,
Cur ſuprà bellum Thebanum, & funera Troia,
Nōn alius alij quoque res occurrere poeſe?

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the liege of Thebes or Troyes laſt fall,
Why did no Poet ſing ſome elder warre?

It is true that in theſe times Greece was very ſaluage, the inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by ſtrong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercoure they vſed little, neither did they plant many trees, or ſow more corne than was neceſſarie for their ſuſtenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who meaſures the vawe of gold and braſſe by the worth in cattel; ſaying that the golden armour of Glaucus, was worth 100. beeces, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and ſea were common and without ſhame, and to ſtale horſes or kine was the vſual exerciſe of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof thoſe that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principal Citie in Peloponneſus was a very little thing, and it may wel be thought that the reſt were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in ſome ſmall townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponneſus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietneſſe within their narrow bounds; as likewiſe did the

Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in general was very rude it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the præface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these latter times, idle Choniders use when they want good matter, to fill whole bookes with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to reade, so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their Gods, and the mightie men which they begat, without writing ought that fauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the brieue whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing bene cast forth when hee was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what cuill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who hee was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to bee his mother, hee begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murder and incest hee had committed, he tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say, that Oedipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes, because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere; and so by course rule interchangeably: but this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres Government reigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talam then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, hee was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-houise, on the backside.

There hee met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fledde from Calidon: with whom struing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At what time perceiuing in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an old Oracle, by which hee was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestowe his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Dei- phile vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as he could draw to follow him, hee was desirous among others to carrie Amphiarus the sonne of Oideus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both vterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eryphile the wife of Amphiarus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbade his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betwene Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eryphile, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a woman should, that shee loued a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, sought such comfort fort as reuenge might afford, giuing in charge to his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother and make strong warre vpon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which the seauen chiefe leaders were, himselfe, Amphiarus, Capanus, and Hippomedon (in steade of whom some name Meiſſeus) all Argines, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aeolian, and Parthenopaus the Arcadian sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the armie came to the Nemean wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water, she hauing a child in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argines to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the child. This woman was Hippolyte the daughter of Thebas the Lemnian, whom they would haue saued when the women of the Isle slew all the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an Amaconian life. For such her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did sell her to Pyrrates, and the Pyrrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemaa, whose yonger sonne Opheltus or Archemorus, shee did nurse, and loſt as is shewed before. When vpon the child's death shee hid her selfe for feare of her maiſter, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argines did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the child, and in memorie of the chauce, did institute solemne funeral games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Aion, Tydeus with whorle bats, Amphiarus at running and quitoing, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Laedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when hee had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set downe.

From Nemaa the Argines marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolute to holde what hee had, as long as hee could: which Tydeus perceiuing and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, hee made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much cruie and malice of the people, who laide fictie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fictie hee slewe all but one, whome hee sent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argines vnderstood how resolute Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seauen gates, which belike Roode not farre asunder, seeing that the Argines (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster vp more thousandes then Thebes had gates) did compass the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capanus before the Oxygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proetis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Elettra, and Polynices at Hippſſa. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men; and appointed Commanders vnto them, tooke aduise of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, if Menecius the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vowe himselfe to bee slaine in honour of Mars the God of warre: So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and so enuious at his Creators glorie, that hee not onely challengeth honours due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worshippe, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when hee hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wits with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath hee exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gelles, Germanes, Cyprians, Aegyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grewe more wise, so did hee waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduise of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxen instead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Affrick: and crucified the Prictes in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of haye in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue been practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satan's malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Meneceus as soone as hee vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as 10 hee thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was battell fought, wherein the Argines preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walles, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when hee fell or was cast downe, or (as writers haue it) was stricken downe by Iupiter with a thunderbolt, the Argines fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, slew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Ashtus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon 20 which was one of the seuen Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seauen (who was said to haue bene so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiarus, which hee cruelly tore open and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wound, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall did perish through the beastly rage, that hee shewed at his death.

The host of the Argines being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fledde: of whom Amphiarus is said to haue been swallowed quicke into the earth, nere to the riuer Issmenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peraduenture overwhelmed with dead carcases or drowned in the riuer: and his bodie neuer found nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arien, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes, after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argines to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to be buried quicke, because shee had fought out and buried the bodie of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an armie vnder the Conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argines to Sepulture: at which time Enadme the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the funerall fier, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse reuenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeeres after hauing leuied forces Aegialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Stenelmus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Menalippus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alemaon the sonne of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphiloctus. Apollo promised victorie if Alemaon were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the citie, they were incountred by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slew Aegialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driuen to flee, or (according to Apollodorus) slaine by Alemaon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuained themselves with their wiues and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, till at length they built the Towne called Effiaa. The Argives when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and laid it walt; howbeit it is reported by some that the Towne was saued by Thersander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there raigne ouer them. That hee saued the Citie from vtter destruction, it is very likely; for hee raigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

Of Ierphtha, and how the three hundred yeeres which hee speaketh of, Ivd. ii.

v.28. are to be reconciled with the places Act. 13.20. 1.R. 6.6.6.1.
together with some other things touching Chronologi about these times.

After the death of Jair (nere about whose times these things happened in Greece, and during whose gouernment, and that of Thola, Israel liued in peace and in order) they resulted againe from the law, and service of God, and became more wicked and Idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adioyning, and embraced the dolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now hee scourged them by the Ammonites; and after 30 ward by the Philistims.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered vpon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seeke Iephtha, whom they formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former iniuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of deuillish hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Gouernour after victorie. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammon's right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailling nothing, he begante the warre; and being strengthened by God, ouer-threw them: and did not only beate them out of the plaines, but forth them ouer the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Misraim, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victorie it is said, that he performed the vaine vow, which hee made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee incountred, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and only desired two Moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that shee was not offered, is more probable, which 40 Bortheus and others proue sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephtha's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slauierie that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephtha, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Iephtha hereupon inforced to defend himselfe against their furie, in the incounter slew of them two and fortie thousand, which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistims had had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephtha after he had iudged Israel fix years died: to whom succeeded Isean, who ruled seven years: after him Eloa was their Iudge, ten years: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Eloa, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall bee necessarie vpon the occasion of Iephtha's account of the times Jud. 11. 28. (where he saies that Israel had then possit the East side of Jordan 300. years) to speake somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Iephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul Ait. 13. the third that which is in the first of Kings. Iephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. years: Saint Paul giueth to the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeares. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeares. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephtha's 300. yeares to be but 266. yeares, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Dehora, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Iephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentissimum, ex quo nullus litum ea dera mouerit Israel: So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundred yere, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrarye finds more yeares than Iephtha named by 65. to wit, 305. whereof 71. were spent in Israel's captiuitie, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephtha forbore to repeat the whole summe or any great part, least the Ammonites should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeares, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassalls to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name 300. yeares it was enough for prescription, hee omitted the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeares, besides the 71. yeares of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. yeares more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeares hee findeth out thus: 20. yeares hee giues to the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth but 18. yeares to Iosua's gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas S. Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melanchton 32. The truth is that this addition of 28. yeares is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeares of affliction (to wit, 34. yeares of the 71.) if wee addeth them to the 266. yeares of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we haue the iust number of 300. yeares. Neither is it strange that Iephtha should leaue out more than halfe of these yeares of affliction: seeing as it is already said the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeares, and say that during these yeares, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion making those 300. yeares remembered by Iephtha, to be 306. which odd yeares, saith he, Iephtha omitteeth. But because the yeares of euery Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306. but doe only compound 266. therefore doth Luther add to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea: which fortie yeares of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Iephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these wordes. Because Israel tooke my Land, when they came vp from Egypt from Arnon vnto Iaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Landes quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to bee accounted from Moses departure out out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possit. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel tooke my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtha answereth also confirmeth in these wordes. When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Arer and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeares: why did yee not then recouer them in that space? so as this place speaketh directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeares: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possit it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for wee doe not vie to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless like the opinion of Luther, and saies that this time of 300. yeares hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephtha's narration: when he makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges in our translation in these wordes. But when Israel came vp from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeares (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeares: and not only the time in which Israel possit Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtha's owne wordes: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeares, from the deliuerance out of Egypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of S. Paul's and Iephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue bene signified. For first, touching Iephtha's 300. yeares of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession, which they had, passed to Israel, and so Iephtha might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeares, reckoning 266. yeares of their owne possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul Ait. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeares. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter, (as I finde his opinion cited by Functus Krentsemius, and Beza, for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeare of Heli, but 357. yeares: and this hee doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeares.

Now for as much as S. Paul (as it seemes) finds 450. yeares from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but 30. yeares for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Salomon who ware the Crowne three whole yeares ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this peece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeares, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the wordes then afterward, being clearly referred to the death or after the death of Iosua, as shall be hereafter proued. But where S. Luke rehearsing the wordes of S. Paul wrote 350. yeares (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being decieued by the affinity of those two Greeke wordes, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosis for Triacosis 400. yeares, for 300. yeares, and 450. for 350. This hee seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great Annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza beginne at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iosua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeares: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Samsons yeares) 319. and of yeares of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers 111. Thereason why he doth not reckon

Jud. 15. a. 1.

Sampson 20. years, is because he thinks that they were part of the 40. years, in which the Philistines are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain that during all Sampson's time they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. years, which two summe put together make 430. years, and whereas S. Paul nameth 450. years, he finds 20. years to make up S. Paul's number, to have beene spent after the death of Iosua by the Seniors, before the captiuitie of Chusban, or the election of Othniel: which 20. years added to 430. make 450. according to S. Paul. To approue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iosua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the daies of 10 sva, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-lived 10 sva, so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. years, which make as before 450. according to S. Paul. Neither would it breede any great difficultie in this opinion, if here also the 20. years of the Seniors, betweene Iosua and Othniel, should be denied. For they which denie these years and make Othniel 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iosua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. years lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeares of affliction apart from the yeares of the Judges) in the number of Sampson's yeares, and of the 40. yeares of the Philistines oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeares more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeares of oppression all of them a-part from Sampson's 20. but Codoman as is said makes Sampson's 20. to be the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistines oppressions; so that if the 20. yeares of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to enforce) that the Philistines in an Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeares besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge, and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeares betweene the end of Iosua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of any Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betweene Iosua and Othniel: For if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeares, to which if we adde the yeares of the Judges, which are 339. we haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeares, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of S. Paul doth evidently teach the contrarie, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be S. Paul's wordes: And about the time of 40. yeares, God suffered their manners in the wilderness. And he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gaue vnto them Judges about 450. yeares, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses and of his yeares spent in the wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse he cometh to the acts of Iosua, which 40. were that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Judges about 450. yeares, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of S. Paul's meaning, so farre as my weak vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconuenience of any waite in opinion of Codoman touching this place, in the Acts is that it seemes irreconcilable with the account 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeares betweene the end of Iosua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeares betweene the beginning of the Israelite iourning from Aegypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeares 1. Reg. 6. 1. must be giuen to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their iourning from Aegypt, which he makes to be 25. yeares after the beginning of Othniel's government; from whence if we call the yeares of the Judges, with the yeares of servitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make make 397. yeares) and so to these yeares adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeares. Neither is it hard (saith he) that the annus egressionis 1. Reg. 6. 1. should be vnderstood egressionis non incipientis sed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Aegypt (for so it is in the originall) or the year after they came out of Aegypt, may well be vnderstood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeares after they had set foot out of Aegypt, are said to haue beene done in their going out of Aegypt, as Iosua 1. 14. When Israel came out of Aegypt, Jordan was druen back, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Aegypt. And thus farre it seemes we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the word ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Iunius Deut. 4. 45. doe well read quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that here in he doth well, why may not we also, to auoide contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

The next point to be cleared is how their iourning should bee said not to haue had end vntill the 25. year after the victorie of Othniel. To this Codoman answereth that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length feared themselves, as it is declared Jud. 18. For doublelesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephia, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings 6. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessarie that we should suppose that Othniel liued all those 40. yeares of rest, of which Jud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. year after his victorie, either he might haue been dead, or at least as Gideon did, he might haue refused all soueraigntie, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. year after Othniel's victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering that the speeches of S. Paul, haue not other wise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set downe. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authoritie, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othniel? Or what other probabilite hath he than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after 40. yeares and twentie yeares, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes.

Now concerning the rehearfall of the law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeede be properly said to haue beene, when Israel came out of Aegypt, like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the holy Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I thinke he can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or saith by conuersion the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Aegypt. Indeed most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say that King Edward at his aliue out of Palestina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlew. How may we then beleeue that enterprise performed so many yeares after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue beene at the time of the departure out of Aegypt: Or who will not thinke it most strange that the most notable account of time, serving as the only guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning, from that illustrious delivrance out of Aegypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, where of the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Towne by 600. men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idolls to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Cadoman buildeth hath either no time given to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeede rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivred them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges, and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul: did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to haue bene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the Historie being so well knowne and beleueed of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeares consumed in the wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeares. In like manner he proceeded saying that from the diuision of the Land vnto the daies of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeares. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and cleuen yeares of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeares of the Judges: for this had bene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is a worke not so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeares is so expressly and purposely set downe.

Now that the wordes of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeares to the raigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeares were diuided bet weene Saul and Samuel, yea that farr the greater part of them were spent vnder the government of the Prophet, how fouer they are here included in the raigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion when it fauoureth not such expolition as they bring out of a good minde to helpe where the neede is not ouer-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The wordes of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Berodius, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those daies, that the 111. yeares of seruitude were to be reckoned a part from the 339. yeares ascribed to the Judges, which accept the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict; but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith quasi quadringenti & quinquaginta annis, as it were four hundred and fiftie yeares. But Cadoman being not thus contented would needs haue it to be so indeede; and therefore disioynes the members to make the accompte euen. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposefully and precisely doth cast vp the yeares from the departure out of Aegypt, vnto the building of Salomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faith faith to his owne interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to find some new expolition for that which is of it selfe most plaine; than to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he looeth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answere, That Othaniel could not gouerne about 25. yeares, because then was the taking of Lailah, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs haue taken Lailah at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Aegypt, without excluding the yeares of seruitude; And that the yeares of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himselfe should haue spent his time vaine-ly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an expolition: Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of any iudicious Reader.

And now to proceede in our storie. To the time of Iephia are referred the death of Heracles, the rape of Helen by Pandrus, and the prouisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recoverie. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth yeare of Ithaca: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not beginne till the third of Alpharion, yet the Greekes had lixe yeares to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this Warre, longa praeparatio bellum aduersari victoriam; That is, longe praeparatio beget a speculie victorie: for the Greekes consumed ten yeares in the attempt; and Troy as it seemed was entred, sackt and burnt in the third yeare of Habdon.

Three yeares after Troy taken, which was in the fixt yeare of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth yeare of his rule died; after he had bene the Father of 40. Iames and 30. grand-children: and whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeares of *Israel*s oppression by the Philistims (of which Isaiah 23. 18. speaketh beginning from the ninth yeare of Samson, and ended with the lust of Habdon): I see no great reason for this opinion: For Samson had had little cause of quarrell with Iephia, for not calling them to Warre ouer Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field it is not likely that they were so oppressed, and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne delivrance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Samson being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeares must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson and afterward: or else they must bee referred to the inter-regnum betweene the death of Habdon, and the deburance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

Of the Warre of Troy.

p. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue observed Historicall truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other Stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by mozt Chrono-logers is found in the time of Habdon, Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather choose here to intreate of in one intire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to breake the Storie into peeces by rehearsing a part in diuers yeares the diuerlitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tenecr and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil, which if he (as Reineccius thinks) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it from him, then it rests vpon the authoritie of Virgil, who saith thus.

Where LOVE was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundredth great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
TEYCEER the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rætæan shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought In lowest vales. Hence CYBELS rites were brought:
Hence Corybantiæ Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus

Thus it seemes by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Tenecr first gaue name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus.

Est locus Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt: Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere gleba.
OEnotrij coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race.
OEnotrians held it, now the later progenie Gives it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie,
This seate belongs to vs, hence DARDANVS,
Hence came the Author of our stock, Isus,

Some old Auruncans, I remember well
(Though time haue made the fame obscure) would tell

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Tenecr, and Thrace, are deriued from Tiras or Thiras the sonne of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Mylians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were Germane Nations, descended from Askenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrey, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Askenaz gaue name to those places and people it is not vnlkely: neither is it vnlkely that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Tenecr came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Tenecr, whereas Italicarnesius makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authoritie is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow: seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Tenecr were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diomedes and others, that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Troian Kingdome, with the length of euery Kings raigne, I haue chosen good Authors to bee my guides, that in a Historie, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie whilest it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. yeares more ancient than the beginning of the 94th. Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe betweene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeare of the 94th. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeares, that is, 408. yeares went betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authoritie of Diodorus be good proofe, who elsewhere tells vs, that the returne of the Heracleida, which was 80. yeares after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeares before the first Olympiad.

Hereunto agrees the authoritie of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is foure and twentie yeares after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in expresse wordes makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphidius, 408. yeares later than the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by necessarie inference out of diuers other places in the same booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as hee is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same total summe, wanting but one yeare, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, doe neither cohere any way nor depend vpon any collateral Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeare before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: wee must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end out of Eusebius, who leades vs from Dardanius on-wards through the raignes of 40 four Kings, by the space of two hundred and fife and twentie yeares, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, wee are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Amnius his Authors; beleeuing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings raignes and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Amnius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point wee neede not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or account of time depends vpon the raigne of the former Kings, but only vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that wee are careful to place that memorable accident in the due yeare.

True it is that some objections appearing waightie, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeares, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeare; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprize that was vnder-taken by generall consent of all Greece was the last Warre of Troy, which hath bene famous euen to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great batailes fought with variable successe: the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of the great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Troians, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue bene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of of many writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose verses haue giuen immortalitye to the Nation, which might else perhaps haue bene buried in oblivion, among other worthy deedes done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith;

Vixit: sortis ante AGAMENNONA
Multi, sed omnes illeachrimabiles
Vrgentur, ignotique longæ Noctæ: carent quia vate sacro.

10

Many by valour haue deseru'd renowne
Ere AGAMENNON: yet lye all opprest
Vnder long night, vnwept for and vnknowne:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilest these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble vndertakers: they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them of Poets, in whose works are both profit & delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted ouermuch; but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the sonne of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes: but how he was hereunto emboldened it is doubtful.

30

§. II.

Of the Rape of HELEN: and strength of both sides for the warre.

Erodorus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre: saying, That whereas the Phenicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to bee reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they tetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodorus affirms) was emboldened to doe the like, not fearing such reuenge as infused. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phenicians? or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, plead any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phenicians? They did a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie make it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vied at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to think, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations as barbarous, for the iniurie received by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hefione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue bene true.

For

for Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruell man, seeing his owne sonne Teucer durst not come in his light, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so that Helen was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard, either to the rape of Euroopa, Medea, or Helen: but was merely incited by Venus, that is by his lust, to do that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus discouerseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Country, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practises, as it appears in Thucydides were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beautie of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, hee gaue free choyce of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many islands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he imbarqued for Troy in his owne ships, which were more than any other of the Greece Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or ledde by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus, or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprize; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build shippes with deckes; onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small shippes, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian armie consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie, doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which tenne whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliades; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

p. III.

Of the Gracians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Heleues being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia

10 V Herefore the Greekes unwilling to come to tryall of armes, if things might bee compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy; who demaunded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answered the Troians made hereunto it is vncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests makes it very probable that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helena, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because hee was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demaunding Helen had answered, that she was in Egypt: 20 they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeed she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Enrypides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Ladie, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysseys, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleueed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene 30 driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediatly vpon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such windes as hee could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauens in the Greece Seas; whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vtter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for 40 Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truely, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had bene rauished by Thesew the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Cassius and Pollux (he and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twinnes) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aiax in their companie before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so, that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very 50 well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calebes (whom some say to haue bene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoste with many troublesome answers and diuinations. For he would haue *Agamemnon*s daughter sacrificed to appease

Liana,

Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddesse was contented with a hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is that the malice of the deuill which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible till some fatall impediments were remoued: and that till tenne yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding the Greekes proceeded in their enterprize; vnder the commaund of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phoenix; Aias and Teucer the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus,<sup>10</sup> and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Visites, Mnestibrew the sonne of Petrews, captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wise and learned Palamedes; Acalaphus, and Ialmenus, the sonnes of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the sonne of Peon, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said that the Citie could not be taken; Aias the sonne of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tisandrus, Eurypilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sonnes of Aesculapius; Epeus who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

20

§. IIII.

Of the Actes of the Gracians at the siege.

THese and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the war would bee more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: saue onely that by their numbers<sup>30</sup> of men, they wonne ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cheroneesse: others to robbe vpon the sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receiue little losse by them, having equall numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat, if the enemy got the better.

40

Wherefore Ouid saith, that from the first yeare till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible the report of Herodotus; That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeeres: but onely did beate vp and downe the seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not vntill the fatall time drew neere, when it should be subuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them, and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue bene supposed that hee should bee ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilst the rest made purueyance by land and sea: the other that the whole<sup>50</sup> whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coastes. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authours: for they make report of many townes and Islands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had beene to bee performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any rancome: but Heracles interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised pestilent fogges, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish peece of ground. And it might well bee that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had beene abrode, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their shippes within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles, lea about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as General, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe an other, then Alex, Phyllis; and so the rest of the Chieftaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father, Apollo's Priest; that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would not looke his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had beene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Alex, or to Phyllis. Hereupon Achilles desired him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Conscience by strong hand; nor to reuenge her loss, otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to lend forth his Companies: But the Greekes encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troupes.

The Troians were now relictued with great iacours; all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them ayde: partly drawn to that warre by their Commianders, who assisted Tristram for money, where with he abounded when the warre beganne (as apperates by his words in Homer) for loile of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes; when they wasted the Countrey adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the towne, hee was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders: The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other sonnes of Priamus; Antenor, and his sonnes; Polydamas, Sarpidon, Glaucus, Astius; and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall, Mentor, Queen Penelope, and others who came towards the end of the warre: Betwene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were that at the taking of Ilium upon the plaines; and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their shippes: at which time Alex, the sonne of Tristram with his brother Teucer, were in the maine the onely men of horse that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hector, when the rest of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troopes rescuing the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Phyllis, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres; hauing slaine a man, to stripp him and and hale away his bodie, nor restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of make. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foote, slightly armed, and commonly followed the fuccesse of their captaines; who rode not vpon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trauie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their lauelins, and then alighting fought on foote, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with anew dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defensive were helmets, breft-plates, bootes of brasse or other metall, & shields commonly of leather, plated ouer. The onlinie were swords and battel-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepe them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest warre hauiest: also that from them they might throw their lauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often druen to returne to their Tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chiefs) carried his owne compleat, of which if 10 any peece were lost or broken, he was druen to repaire it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from some Captaine whom hee had slaine, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such meanes gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to awaite the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deere friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worke, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be belieued) hee chased three times about the walles of Troy. But great question may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiving Hector in such an extraxime, would haue forborne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrulling leatherne thongs into 40 them, tyed him to his Chariot; and dragged him shamefully about the field, killing the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his crueltie and cometousnesse were not long vnreunited, for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes in the Scæan gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe same rate that Hector was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penelope Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who after some prospectiue of her valour, was slaine by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles.

of the taking of Troy, the wadden Horse, the Booke of Dares and DICTIS, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

10 Finally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treason of Æneus and Antenor, or by a wadden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well bee that with some wadden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romans in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the wals vpon the sudden and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a wadden horse, it had bene a desperate aduerture, and seruing to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceived the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon) or they might haue left it a fewe days without the Citie (for it was vnlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their walles vpon the suddaine to doe it) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by inslitting forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was built so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall, to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that 30 without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprizing of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

10 Iohn Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this war, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wall with a wadden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without feare or cure, because the flecte of the Greeks had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed the bookes of Dares and Lycius must proue, which whither we now haue the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they 40 did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the Common report: that it not been that either those bookes were euen in those times thought friuolous; or else contained no such repugnance to the other authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre which Dares and Dyctis say to haue bene about 600000. on the Troian side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report merely fabulous; forasmuch as the whole flecte of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and dedes as much as hee could, to bee somewhat lesse than 1200. sile, and the armie therein transported or the Greeke seas, not much about 100000. men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the dedes of their Ancestors: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greekes, that served in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending & extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long long after in the warre which Alexander the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mineius the sonne of Petens had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had beene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admirall of their Seas, notwithstanding that hee promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romanes, brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellenus addeth that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

CONCERNING the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anone after their arrival: others were debarred from the Soueraignty among their people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue beene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided so many peeces vnder seuerall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot wordes, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them failing to the Ile of Tenedos: where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon, others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole Fleet was vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not bee perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterward slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgill tels, were driven soone after to seeke new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandering long vpon the Seas, came into Aegypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Vlisses, after ten yeeres, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recovering the mastershippe of his owne house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to seeke out new habitations.

Aias the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Damius, who was Lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Loerians were driven into Africke, others into Italy; all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driven to erect vpon to erect vpon that coast. Finally it appears in Homer that the Grecian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Isabon Iudge of Israell, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of SAMSON, ELI, and SAMUEL.

§. I.

Of SAMSON.

HE birth and aces of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First that the Angell of God forbade the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to cate any vnclean meate, after she was conceived with child; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the child in the mothers wombe: Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue: not read, or at least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing not drincks, nor meats, how strong or vnclean foucer, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drincks farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Deuils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euertit; Whom no force could overcome, voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israell from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israell feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vnder these wordes. Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs? &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them another ouerthrow and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars pillars of the house at the feast wherto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till with time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patientia sapientia virtutis in furorē, Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli and of the Arke taken, and of DAGONS fall, and the sending backe of the Arke.

THe storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophane and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrarie opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to call the Israelites vnder the sword of the Philistines, of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 3000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Boodi the fifth, Ozai the sonne of Boodi the sixth, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lysanias out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abisithar, and established Sadok and Achimias and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistines. For as David witnesseth. God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he sought the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Maccabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious, as any that garded themselves by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an enligne; David witnesseth when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; he forbade it, and caused it to be returned into the Citie, vying these words. If I shall finde fauour in the eyes of the Lord, hee will bring mee againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleued that while their Palladium or the image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer bee ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatal battell against Saladin carrie into the field, as they were made beleue, the very Crosse whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Christ himselfe vpon Saint Matthew (if that bee his worke) giueth a good iudgment, speaking of those that were a part of Saint Iohns Gospel about their neckes, for an amulet or preseruatue. Si tibi ea non presunt in ambrum, auribus quomo. so proderant in Collo? If those words doe not profit men in their eares (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reuerence of the Father that gaue the one for a memorie of his Councant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, which in this life or after it.

The Philistines returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and set it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboute to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the Deuill inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles wherein the Liueli derided and betrayed mortall men lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, shining vpon the earth which had beene long obscured by Idolatrie, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarke receaerth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great God Pan, as hee stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but friuolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Demus, and the whole race became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistines triumphed after this victorie, God strook them with the grievous disease of the Hemorrhoides: of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered that the Arke should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistines; to proue, as it seemeth whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and hee smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath lent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philistines: but they also felt the same smart, and cried out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduise of their Priests, the Prince of the Philistines did not onely refuse to return the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembering the plagues which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to bee almightie, and that their owne Idols were subiect thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vying these words; So see shall glorie to the God of Israel that hee may take his hand from you, and from your Gods and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle, Pulcherrimum est testimonium, quo nostris probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharaos confesse the liuing God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seene his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two miche kine to bee chosen, such as had not bene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to bee framed: but they durst
